Heredity Triumphant

By Alice Leonard Carson

Copyright, 1906, by E. C. Parcells

A shrill whistle echoed along the sunny avenue. Mary Dexter jumped from her seat on the piano, scattering embroidery silks in all directions. She waved her handkerchief in response. Then she ran into the house calling: "Aunt Linda! Where are you? Here's Dave Green to see you!"

Without waiting for a reply she returned to the porch just in time to greet the young man who came up the steps. "Glad to see me, Mary?" he asked as with a hasty glance around she put her face for a kiss. Then the two sat down on the top step in earnest, subdued conversation. Mary Dexter was a maid of nineteen with a fresh peachbloom complexion. Today, wearing a simple white frock, she looked her best—and knew it.

In a few minutes an elderly woman came out the front door. Her hair, worn as a coronet, was silvery white though she was only forty. Age had touched her face lightly, pressing in the wrinkles with loving fingers that left only sweetness in the expression. Humor told a romantic tale of Linda Pennington's life, and for once rumor was right. A girlish engagement with a young army officer who fell in his first battle, a few years as a nurse in the war, interrupted by a marriage with Lyall Pennington, early widowhood and a subsequent life devoted to good work—these were among the incidents in her story. For many years all her plans had been for Mary, whom she had adopted long ago.

Mrs. Pennington had taken a great interest in Mary because she came from her own town, and the case of the child was particularly pitiful, for there were no near relatives to whom she could be sent.

Fresh from the sadness caused by the death of her husband, Linda found the child's companionship a great comfort. Mary had passed serenely through the stages of childhood and youth and now, at nineteen, under the training of private tutors, was prepared to enter

"ISN'T IT A BEAUTY, AUNT LINDA?"

Merton college in the fall. After graduation endless possibilities opened before her. This was the situation that July morning when Mrs. Pennington came out on the porch and greeted young David Green, one of Mary's admirers.

He was a manly fellow of twenty-one, son of a prosperous farmer of the rural district in which Linda had built up a good sized tract of land by his father, with the instruction to "see what you could do with it," and he was doing well.

"You've just come back from New York, haven't you, David?" asked Mrs. Pennington.

"Yes," said Mary. "He's been away two or three days."

The sigh with which this was said brought a laugh from the other two. Mary's love. Don't you remember how it was then?"

How old memories can rise again! A vision of a certain garden, with pleading eyes and tender smile. And that parting—could she ever forget the kiss? Or the bitter take and David's never-saw him again. His body could not be found. Ah!" Steadying her voice, she went on. "You are right, David. It was foolish and wrong to try to control Mary's life. She must work it out for herself. My plans were different from this, but I can give them up, as I have given up others."

"Dear Mrs. Pennington," said David, grasping her hand.

Then, when Mary ran off to set the table and David followed, with awkward attempts to help, Linda Pennington drew forth an old locket and gazed long at the portrait within. "Once I thought that the shattering of my dreams would kill me," she murmured. "But I tried to thank God for other dreams and duties that came. So it will be now, I think."

"Supper is ready, Aunt Linda!" called Mary, and Mrs. Pennington turned from the sunset glow.

A Welsh Rip.

Every nation has a Rip Van Winkle of its own, but the Welsh story of Rip is unique. He is known as Hir Ifan Sion. One morning Taffy heard a bird singing on a tree close by his path. Allured by the melody, he sat down until the music ceased. When he arose, what was his surprise at observing that the tree under which he had taken a seat had now become dead and withered! In the doorway of his cabin, which, to his amazement, had also suddenly grown older, he asked made all her friends wait on her.

"Did you go away on business, David?" she asked hastily.

"No—yes—well, I don't know as you'd call it exactly business."

"I should," said Mary decidedly—"the most important business for you just now, Dave." The lad laughed, embarrassed.

"Dear me, this sounds very mysterious," said Mrs. Pennington, smiling. "What is it all about?"

"I went to get something for Mary," said David.

"And here it is," said the girl, holding out her left hand. "Isn't it a beauty, Aunt Linda?" A handsome solitaire flashed into view.

The significance of the stone did not enter Linda Pennington's mind, for it was many years since she had thought of such things. "Mary, you know you may not receive presents of jewelry from young men," she was beginning, but the words died on her lips. Mary and David, looking for some sign of approval, read in her face grief, disappointment and refusal.

"Aren't you pleased?" went on the girl. "We've been engaged since Christmas. Before I visited Florrie Tucker, Dave asked me and I said, 'I'd see.' Then while I was away he kept writing to me—and I always did like him best of any of the boys—so I just had to say 'yes.' He's so obstinate, Dave is, he wouldn't take 'no.'"

"Of course I am very much surprised," Linda said when she could control herself to speak. "I think you are both too young to talk of such things. Besides, you are going to college soon, Mary, and I do not approve of indefinite engagements."

"But there's nothing indefinite about our engagement," replied the girl airily, twisting the ring on her finger. "We are to be married in September."

"What?"

"Oh, yes, it's all settled," nodding her head. "I wrote this morning to Merton canceling my application. I'm tired of study—what is the use of it? I know more now than any other girl or boy almost—in Dorsettown. Just think, after September I'll never have to study any more!"

Mrs. Pennington rose in wrath from her chair. "Mary," she cried sharply, "you don't know what you're saying! You are giving up carelessly what I would give years of my life to have had when I was a girl—and you will always regret giving up. I don't often exercise my authority as your guardian, but when you act like a silly child I must. I ask you—no, I order you—to break this engagement."

Mary sprang up and stamped her foot angrily. "Well, I won't!" she cried. "And you can't make me; I'm nineteen years old!"

Linda sank back in the chair with trembling lips. The mother who had eloped was speaking through her daughter. "Mary, if you love me," she pleaded, but she knew it would be no use. The girl was angry, was wounding, and she must bow to the inevitable.

Mary never would understand what a blow this was to her guardian's ambitions for her. College, then advanced work, or, if the girl preferred, art study in Paris or music in Germany—these the plans she had made. And this mad whim must overturn them all!

The girl's storm of fury spent itself in floods of tears. "Aunt Linda, I can't. Don't ask me to," she sobbed.

David drew his sweetheart toward him. He had been a silent, troubled witness of the scene. Now he spoke quietly.

"It's like this, Mrs. Pennington, we love each other, and we don't see the use of waiting. If we wait four years by then we'll have grown apart perhaps, and it will be harder to give in to each other. We want to be married at once. I am making a good living; my people are pleased, and we only want your consent."

But she shook her head impatiently. "I have nothing against you, David, but—it is impossible."

"Oh, no, Mrs. Pennington!" he cried. "Think—think—when you were young and in love. Don't you remember how it was then?"

How old memories can rise again! A vision of a certain garden, with pleading eyes and tender smile. And that parting—could she ever forget the kiss? Or the bitter take and David's never-saw him again. His body could not be found. Ah!" Steadying her voice, she went on. "You are right, David. It was foolish and wrong to try to control Mary's life. She must work it out for herself. My plans were different from this, but I can give them up, as I have given up others."

"Dear Mrs. Pennington," said David, grasping her hand.

Then, when Mary ran off to set the table and David followed, with awkward attempts to help, Linda Pennington drew forth an old locket and gazed long at the portrait within. "Once I thought that the shattering of my dreams would kill me," she murmured. "But I tried to thank God for other dreams and duties that came. So it will be now, I think."

"Supper is ready, Aunt Linda!" called Mary, and Mrs. Pennington turned from the sunset glow.

INDIGESTION CURED.
BY DR. WILLIAMS' PINK PILLS AFTER SIX DOCTORS HAD FAILED TO BE OF BENEFIT.
That gnawing pain in the stomach, sometimes shooting up into the chest, often producing a choking sensation in the throat; fierce pains around the heart; a feeling of drowsiness and a distaste for food—that's indigestion. Its victims are numbered by the thousands. To them life is a burden. Yet they need not have done more towards relieving their suffering than any other man, if Mr. Willis Herman, of St. Catharines, Ont., had known what had been afflicted with indigestion and stomach trouble for years. At times his suffering was almost unbearable. Sometimes he would be for days unable to retain food. He tried and at different times was treated by six doctors but got no relief. In time; I only grew worse. For a time I was living in New York and while there consulted a specialist but he was unable to give me any relief. I then decided to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills and in less than a month I felt some relief. I continued treatment for a couple of months longer and gained in weight; my appetite improved; the pains left me and I now feel better than I have at any time during the past twenty-five years. I will always gladly recommend Dr. Williams' Pink Pills to other sufferers believing that they will surely do for others what they have done for me."
When you use Dr. Williams' Pink Pills as a blood builder and nerve tonic you are not experimenting as they have been tried and proved successful in thousands of cases. It is their power to actually make new, rich red blood that enables them to cure such troubles as anaemia, indigestion, backache, kidney trouble, rheumatism, all forms of nervous weakness, and the special ailments that make so much misery for one sex or the other. Sold by all medicine dealers or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

Oyster Cocktail.
A good recipe for an oyster cocktail which is simple to make and does not take long is to put the small and thoroughly chilled bivalves in a wineglass, covering them with a sauce composed of a spicy catchup, lemon juice and some freshly grated horseradish.

Trousers in their present shape were introduced into the British army in 1813 and tolerated as a legitimate portion of evening dress in 1816.

Child Betrothals.
To be an old maid in Greece is to bring everlasting disgrace on the family name, so the children are betrothed in childhood, the mother of the girl looking about immediately after the child's birth for a nice family with a little boy. Seldom are these engagements broken in after life.

The Camel.
A camel can easily carry a weight of 1,000 pounds on its back, about four times as much as a horse can carry. The camel begins work at the age of four and is useful for half a century. The horse, as a rule, is nearly played out at the age of fifteen.

CO-OPERATIVE FRUIT SPRAYING.

The Minister of Agriculture for Ontario has, for the past two years, had under consideration plans for further assisting the fruit growers of the Province. Spraying has now become, in productive a superior grade of fruit, the most important operation in the orchard, and while likely practised in certain sections, has not yet been carried to the extension that it requires in the apple sections. The advent of spraying machinery is an such recent date that the advantages it gives, especially in spraying at the right time, are not yet appreciated.

For many years the Department of Agriculture has been advocating more and better spraying. Bulletins have been issued, and the Experimental Farm and the preparation and application of the most effective mixtures have been given throughout the Province with satisfactory results. But it is evident that such information has been sufficiently diffused and absolute step forward is proposed.

The Fruit Growers' Association has within the past three years been instrumental in organizing a large number of fruit growing associations. One of the aims of these associations has been the co-operative spraying of orchards by their members, and it is now proposed to assist these and kindred organizations in such co-operative work. With this aim in view, the Minister of Agriculture has asked the Legislature for a grant of $6,000 to be expended during the current year in encouraging the purchase and operation of a spraying outfit by each of such associations. The machinery and the operating such machinery will be left entirely in the hands of those organizing during 1907. The following rules under which the grant will be available have been made as simple as possible so that the greatest number of associations will be given to the proper spraying of orchards during the present and coming seasons. Following are the regulations governing the appointment of the grants:

A grant of $100 will to made to any five or more farmers who unite to form a fruit growers' association for the purchase and operation of a spraying outfit during the year 1907. These associations must be incorporated to qualify for the grant, though incorporation of co-operative associations will be encouraged in the full benefiting of co-operative spraying.

Co-operative fruit growing associations already operating with spraying outfits may purchase sprayers and be eligible for a grant for the year 1907.

The number of such associations receiving assistance during the present year shall not exceed 100.

At least 25 acres of apple trees must be thoroughly sprayed during the proper season by each of the farmers forming the association.

Such associations before receiving portion of the grant shall report to the inspector of the Department of Agriculture that the trees have been complied with and shall have been sprayed in a satisfactory manner to the Minister of Agriculture.

Associations desirous of participating in this grant must apply to the Department not later than the first day of May.

SUFFERING BABIES.

Mothers can find sure relief for their suffering little ones in baby's own tablets. These tablets are a gentle laxative that do not gripe the little one, and cure all the minor ills of babies and young children. They can be taken by the youngest in their action, and unlike "soothing" stuffs, they never do harm, and the mother has the guarantee of a Government analyst that they contain no drugs. Concerning the youngest baby, Mrs. Thomas Gallagher, Bridgeburg, says: "My little girl was troubled a great deal with baby's Own Tablets when cutting her teeth, curing her troubles, and the tablets soon made her baby, of whom I am very proud indeed, a healthy child." Mrs. Mercier, Pikesville, Que., says, "baby's Own Tablets are a great sufferer from constipation, but thanks to baby's Own Tablets the trouble has disappeared." The Tablets are sold by all druggists or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

DRAINAGE.

Department of Physics,
Ontario Agricultural College,
Guelph, April 10th, 1907.

Editor of The Beaver,—

Dear Sir,—During the past two years the Department of Physics has been investigating the importance of underdrainage, and arrangements have been made whereby our services are available to anyone wishing advice in matters relating to drainage. We have full equipment for drainage surveys work, and, when requested, visit a man's place, survey his land, give him a map showing the various of all grades surveyed, together with location of drains, their grade, depth, etc. There is no charge made for this service, the travelling expenses of one man, consisting of railway fare, meals and lunches, etc., being the only expenses incurred. The survey fees are very light, as arrangements have been made with the railway companies whereby we can travel at one cent a mile each way. Thus a man living fifty miles from Guelph would have an outlay of $1.00 for railway fare, and $3 or $4 extra for cartage; one living one hundred miles away, an outlay of $2.00 for railway fare, and $5 or $6 extra for cartage, and so on.

Last year, together with others, you were kind enough to make announcement of this plan, and many applications for assistance afterwards by way of information or surveys resulted therefrom. I wish to thank you for your kindness and to ask if you will again make mention of the matter.

Yours very truly,

WM. H. DAY,
Lecturer in Physics.

Tramp—Lease, mum, me an' my wife are shipwrecked sailors.—Lady—Shipwrecked, indeed! Better go home and sober up.

Tramp—Quite right, lady. We was at sea.

The Demon, Dyspepsia—In olden times it was a popular belief that demons moved mysteriously through the unseen air, seeking to enter into men and render them ill. The present day demon, dyspepsia, is at large in the same way, seeking habitation in those who by careless or unwise living, have left him and now by means of it, find it is difficult to dislodge him. But that finds himself so possessed should know "that a valiant friend to fight for him with his unseen foe is Parmelee's Vegetable Pills, which are very ready for the fray.

"When I was coming home last night," said Miss Sherry, "a man in a dark skulking along in the shadow. Oh, how I ran!"

"An' couldn't you catch him?" inquired her little brother, innocently.

A Magic Pill—Dyspepsia is a foe with which men are constantly grappling, but cannot exterminate. Doubtless all of such appearances vanquished in the same way, following out of similar directions. In many the digestive organs are weak, and the result is a condition of a watch or scientific instrument, which, with a little attention, will make a variation. With such disorders of the stomach Parmelee's Pills from the most trivial causes and consequences. Parmelee's Vegetable Pills are recommended as most effective.

It is an Elixir of Life—Since forgotten time, men have been seeking for the Elixir of Life, which tradition says once existed. Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil was Elixir before such pain named live. It is made up of vegetable oils, carefully blended so that their curative properties are concentrated. It has no equal for the treatment of rheumatism, neuralgia and all nerve pains.

To all you gay aquatic men, I give this warning note, A drunken man in a canoe Is apt to get afloat.

Dickie's Anti-Consumptive Syrup cures all throat troubles. To those who are familiar with it, it speaks for itself. For those who are not, it will make a variation. With such an abundance of well known testimonials from the most trivial causes and consequences, Dickie's Anti-Consumptive Syrup Vegetable Pills are recommended as most effective.

Mrs. Blushing—Cyril, nothing it that before he met me, life seemed a desert to him?

Mrs. Wilber—That is no reason why he should waltz like a dromedary!

FORMER NEWBURGH BOY.

The Galt Reformer has the following sketch of the business of Mr. S. A. Briscoe, son of Mr. W. Briscoe, Newburgh, now in business in Galt: "The enterprise conducted by Mr. S. A. Proved so popularly known as "The Little Giant" is worthy of more than ordinary mention in this review of Galt and her commercial enterprises; first, because it is of long standing, and second because it is now, and long has been one of the most reliable houses doing business in Galt or vicinity. The premises occupied are very large, are well lighted, well appointed with cash carriers, etc., and are literally packed from floor to ceiling with a varied assortment of merchandise, dry goods, ladies' and gentlemen's furnishings, small wares, ready made clothing for men and women, boots and shoes, carpets and oil cloths, pottery, window shades and a thousand and one articles too numerous to detail, and which must be seen to be appreciated. Mr. Briscoe's connections with manufacturers and jobbers are of a strictly first class character, and as he buys for cash, he is always in a position to meet the closest competition. He employs experienced salesmen only. Mr. Briscoe has been established in Galt fourteen years, has always enjoyed the confidence of the public and has made his establishment a favorite one with economical buyers.

MRS. CATHARINE M. RATTRAY, eldest daughter of the late Allan Caton, of Newburgh, died suddenly in Philadelphia on the 6th inst., of heart trouble and grippe. Mrs. Rattray was engaged in hospital work for about twenty years. She was the matron of Grace hospital, Detroit, for six years, and subsequently held the same position at the General in Elizabeth, N.Y., and University hospital, Philadelphia. About two years ago she resigned her position at the latter hospital to become superintendent of the Widener Memorial School for Crippled Children in Philadelphia, an institution built by a Mr. Widener in memory of his only daughter, a cripple, at a cost of $1,500,000, and afterwards endowed with about $1,000,000. The school was a home for over two hundred little cripples, where they received the best medical aid that money could give, in addition they were educated and taught some trade or profession to enable them through life. Mrs. Rattray leaves one daughter, Mrs. Bowker, New York. Her mother, Mrs. Allan Caton, Brooklyn, N.Y., Mrs. A. G. Bowring, Brooklyn, Mrs. Frailey, New York, Mrs. Jas McKinsel, Buffalo, Fred. A. Caton, Boston, Mass., and A. W. Caton, Napanee, still survive her.

Back in 1886 Campbell's Stains were originated and offered to housekeepers for restaining and renewing finishing furniture and floors once a week. Ask for Campbell's Varnish Stains. Mr. T. B. Wallace sells it.

THE MASQUERADER

gleefully. "But, pardon me, you are still waiting for that light?"

Chilcotte still held the cigarette between his lips. The paper had become dry, and he moistened it as he leaned toward his companion.

"Don't mind me," he said. "I'm rather—rather unstrung tonight, and this thing gave me a jar. To be candid, my imagination took head in the fog, and I got to fancying I was talking to myself—"

"And pulled up to find the fancy in some way real?"

"Yes, something like that."

Both were silent for a moment. Chilcote pulled hard at his cigarette, then, remembering his ...ligations, he turned quickly to the ot...

"Won't you smoke?" he asked.

The stranger accepted a cigarette as the case held out to him, and as he did so the extraordinary likeness to himself struck Chilcote with added force. Involuntarily he put out his hand and touched the other's arm.

"It's my nerves!" he said in explanation. "They make me want to feel that you are substantial. Nerves play such beastly tricks!" He laughed awkwardly.

The other glanced up. His expression on the moment was slightly surprised, slightly contemptuous, but he changed it instantly to conventional interest. "I am afraid I can not as an authority on nerves," he said.

But Chilcote was preoccupied. His thoughts had turned into another channel.

"How old are you?" he asked suddenly.

The other did not answer immediately. "My years?" he said at last slowly. "Well, I believe I shall be thirty-six tomorrow, to be quite accurate."

Chilcote lifted his head quickly.

"Why do you use that tone?" he asked. "I am six months older than you, and I only wish it was six years. Six years nearer oblivion"—

Again a slight incredulous contempt crossed the other's eyes. "Oblivion?" he said. "Where are your ambitions?"

"They don't exist."

"Don't exist! Yet you voice your country? I considered that much in the fog."

Chilcote laughed sarcastically. "When one has voiced one's country for six years one gets hoarse. It's a natural consequence. The other smiled. "Ah, discontent!" he said. "The modern canker. But we must both be getting under way. Good night. Shall we shake hands—to prove that we are genuinely material?"

Chilcote had been standing unsteadily still, following the stranger's words, caught by his self reliance and impressed by his personality. Now, as he ceased to speak, he moved quickly forward, impelled by a nervous curiosity.

"Why should we just hail each other and pass—like the proverbial ships?" he said impulsively. "If nature was careless enough to let the reproduction meet the original she must abide the consequences."

The other laughed, but his laugh was short. "Oh, I don't know. Our roads lie differently. You would get nothing out of me, and I"— He stopped and began to laugh shortly. "Yes, he said, "I'd be content to pass if I were you. The unsuccessful man is seldom a profitable study. Shall we say good night?"

He took Chilcote's hand for an instant, then, crossing the footpath, he passed into the roadway toward the Strand.

It was done in a moment, but with his going a sense of loss fell upon Chilcote. He stood for a space, newly conscious of unfamiliar faces and unfamiliar voices in the stream of passers-by. Then, suddenly mastered by an impulse, he wheeled rapidly and darted after the tall, lean figure so ridiculously like his own.

Halfway across Trafalgar square he overtook the stranger. He had paused on one of the small stone islands that break the current of traffic and was waiting for an opportunity to resume the street. In the glare of light from the lamp above his head Chilcote saw for the first time that, under the superficial neatness of appearance, his clothes were well worn—almost shabby. The discovery struck him like with something stronger than surprise. The idea of poverty seemed incongruous in connection with the reliance, the reserve, the personality of the man. With a certain embarrassed haste he stepped forward and touched his arm.

"Look here," he said as the other turned quietly. "I have followed you to exchange cards. It early injure either of us and I—I wish to know my other self." He laughed nervously as he drew out his cardcase.

The stranger watched him in silence. There was the same faint contempt, but also there was a reluctant interest in his glance as it passed from the fingers fumbling with the case to the pale face with the square jaw, straight mouth and level eyebrows drawn low over the gray eyes. When at last the card was held out to him he took it without remark and slipped it into his pocket.

Chilcote looked at him eagerly. "Now the exchange is complete."

For a second the stranger did not respond. Then, almost unexpectedly, he smiled.

"After all, if it amuses you"— he said; and, searching in his waistcoat pocket, he drew out the required card.

"It will leave you quite unenlightened," he added. "The name of a failure never spells anything." There was another smile, partly amused, partly ironical, he stepped from the little island and disappeared into the throng of traffic.

Chilcote stood for an instant gazing at the point where he had vanished; then, turning to the lamp, he lifted the card and read the name it bore, "Mr. John Loder, 13 Clifford's Inn."

CHAPTER II.

ON the morning following the night of fog Chilcote woke at 8. He was at the moment that his man Allsopp tiptoed across the room and laid the salver with his early cup of tea on the table beside the bed.

For several seconds he lay with his eyes shut. The effort of opening them on a fresh day—the intimate realization of what he would see on opening them—seemed to weight his lids. The heavy, half closed curtains, the blinds severely drawn, the great room with its splendid furniture, its sober coloring, its scent of damp London winter—above all, Allsopp, silent, respectful and respectable—were the things to dread.

A full minute passed while he still feigned sleep. He heard Allsopp stir discreetly, then the inevitable information broke the silence:

"Nine o'clock, sir."

He opened his eyes, murmured something and closed them again.

The man moved to the window, quietly pulled back the curtains and half drew the blind.

"Better night, sir, I hope?" he ventured softly.

Chilcote had drawn the bedclothes over his face to screen himself from daylight, and now, though it was

"Yes," he responded. "Those beastly nightmares didn't trouble me for once." He shivered a little as at some recollection. "But don't talk—don't mind me of them. I hate a man who has no originality." He spoke sharply. At times he showed an almost childish irritation over trivial things.

Allsopp took the reproof in silence. Crossing the wide room, he began to lay out his master's clothes. The accustomed task affected Chilcote to fresh annoyance.

"Confound it!" he said. "I'm sick of that routine. I can see you laying out my winding sheet the day of my burial. Leave those things. Come back in half an hour."

Allsopp allowed himself one glance at his master's figure huddled in the bed clothes, then, laying aside the coat he was holding, he moved to the door. With his fingers on the handle, he paused.

"Will you breakfast in your own room, sir, or downstairs?"

Chilcote drew the clothes more tightly round his shoulders. "Oh, anywhere—nowhere!" he said. "I don't care."

Allsopp softly shut the door.

Left to himself, Chilcote sat up in bed and lifted the salver to his knees. His sudden movement jarred him physically. He drew a handkerchief from under the pillow and wiped his forehead. Then he held his hand to the light and studied it. The hand looked sallow and unsteady. With a nervous gesture he thrust the salver back upon the table and slid out of bed.

Moving hastily across the room, he paused half before one of the heavy robes and swung the door open; then, after a furtive glance around the room, he stepped in. He held his hand to the pleats of a shelf and fumbled there. The thing he sought was evidently not there, for, after a pause, he began to withdraw his hand and moved from the wardrobe to a table beside the dressing case, carrying a small glass tube filled with tabloids.

On the table were a decanter, a glass and a carafe of water. Into nothing whisky, he uncorked the tube. Again he glanced apprehensively toward the door, then, with a nervous hand dropped two tabloids into the glass.

While they dissolved he stood with his head bent, his eyes fixed intently on the floor, evidently restraining his impatience. Instantly they had begun to fizzle he filled the glass and drained it at a draft, replaced the bottle in the wardrobe and, shivering slightly in the raw air, slipped back into bed.

When Allsopp returned he was sitting up, a cigarette between his lips, the tea-cup standing empty on the salver. The nervous irritability had gone from his manner. He no longer moved jerkily; his eyes looked brighter, his pale skin more healthy.

"Ah, Allsopp," he said, "there are some moments in life, after all. It isn't all blank wall."

"I ordered breakfast in the small morning room, sir," said Allsopp, without a change of expression.

Chilcote breakfasted at 10. His appetite, always fickle, was particularly uncertain in the early hours. He helped himself to some fish, but sent away his plate untouched; then, having drunk two cups of tea, he pushed back his chair, lighted a fresh cigarette and took out the morning newspaper.

Twice he shook it out and twice turned it, but the reluctance to fix his mind upon the news daily, the effect of the morphia tabloids was still apparent in the greater steadiness of his hand and eye, the regained quiet of his susceptibilities, but the respite was temporary and lethargic. The early days—the days of six years ago, when these tabloids meant an even sweep of thought, lucidity of brain, a balance of steadiness in thought and effort—were days of the past. As he had said of Lexington and his vice, the slave had become master.

As he folded the paper in a last attempt at interest the door opened, and his secretary came a step or two into the room.

"Good morning, sir," he said. "Forgive me for being so late, sir."

He was a fresh mannered, bright eyed boy of twenty-three. His breezy alertness, his deference, as to a man who had attained what he aspired to, amused and depressed Chilcote by turns.

"Good morning, Blessington. What is it now?" He sighed through habit and, putting up his hand, warded off the effect on that had forced itself through the misty atmosphere as if by mistake.

"It is boy smiled. "It's that business of the Wark timber contract, sir," he said. "You promised you'd look into it today. You know you've settled it for a week already, and Craig-Burnage are rather clamoring for an answer." He moved forward and laid the papers he was carrying on the table beside Chilcote. "I'm sorry to be such a nuisance," he added, "I hope your nerves aren't worrying you today?"

Chilcote was toying with the papers. At the word nerves he glanced up suspiciously. But Blessington's ingenuous face satisfied him.

"No," he said. "I settled my nerves last night with—with the beastly stuff, replenished the fire and left the room. Chilcote still sat on.

At last, feeling unabashed, he rose and crossed to the fireplace. The clock on the mantelpiece stared him in the face. He looked at it intently and slightly drew out his watch. Watch and clock corresponded. Each marked 12 o'clock. With a nervous, hurried movement he turned and pressed the electric bell long and hard.

Instantly a servant answered.

"Is Mr. Blessington in the study?" Chilcote asked.

"He was there, sir, five minutes back."

Chilcote looked relieved.

"All right. Tell him I have gone out—had to go out. Something important. You understand?"

"I understand, sir."

But before the words had been properly spoken Chilcote had passed the man and walked into the hall.

CHAPTER III.

LEAVING his house, Chilcote walked forward quickly and aimlessly. With the sting of the cold air on his face the events of last night's adventure came back upon him. Since the hour of his waking it had been about every subsequence, but now in the clear light of day it seemed to stand out with a fullness of reality.

The thing was preposterous, nevertheless it was genuine. He was wearing the overcoat he had worn the night before, and, acting on impulse, he thrust his hand into the pocket and drew out the stranger's card.

"Mr. John Loder!" He read the name over as he walked along, and it mechanically repeated itself in his brain, falling into measure with his steps. Who was John Loder? What was he? The questions tantalized him till his pace unconsciously increased. He thought that two men so absurdly alike could inhabit the same city and remain unknown to each other fazed him as a problem. It tangled with his personal worries and aggravated them. There seemed to be almost a danger in such an extraordinary likeness. He began to regret his impetuosity in thrusting his card upon the man. Then, again, how he had let himself go on the subject of Lexington! How narrowly he had escaped compromise! He turned hot and cold at the recollection of what he had said and what he might have said. Then for the first time he paused in his walk and looked about him.

On leaving Grosvenor square he had turned westward, moving rapidly till the Marble arch was reached. There, still oblivious to his surroundings, he had crossed the roadway to the Edgware road, passing along it to the labyrinth of shabby streets that lie behind Paddington. Now, as he glanced about him, he saw with some surprise how far he had come.

The damp remnants of the fog still hung about the housetops in a filmy veil. There were no glimpses of grass to break the monotony of tone. All was quiet, dingy, neglected. But to Chilcote the shabbiness was restful, the subdued atmosphere a satisfaction. Among these sad houses, these passersby, each filled with his own concerns, he experienced a sense of respite and relief. In the fashionable streets that bounded his own home it was as if he paused in his walk to work out an idea he instantly drew a crowd of inquisitive or contemptuous eyes. Here if a man halted for half an hour it was nobody's business but his own.

Enjoying this thought, he wandered on for close upon an hour, moving from one street to another with steps that were listless or rapid, as inclination prompted. Then, still acting with vagrant aimlessness, he stopped in his wanderings and entered a small eating house.

The place was low ceiled and dirty, the air hot and steaming with the smell of food, but Chilcote passed through the door and moved to one of the tables with no expression of disgust and with far less furtive watchfulness than he used in his own house. By a curious mental twist he felt greater freedom, larger opportunities in drab surroundings such as these than in the broad issues and weighty responsibilities of his own life. Choosing a corner seat, he called for coffee and there, protected by shadow and wrapped in cigarette smoke, he set about imagining himself some vagrant unit who had slipped his moorings and was blissfully adrift.

The imagination was pleasant while it lasted, but with him nothing was permanent. Of late the greater part of his sufferings had been comprised in the irritable fickleness of all his aims—the distaste for and impossibility of sustained effort in any direction. He had barely lighted a second cigarette when the old restlessness fell upon him. He stirred nervously in his seat, and the cigarette was scarcely burned out when he rose, paid his small bill and left the shop.

Outside on the pavement he halted, pulled out his watch and saw that two hours stretched in front before any appointment claimed his attention. He wondered vaguely where he might go to, what he might do, in these two hours. In the last few minutes a distaste for solitude had risen in his mind, giving the close street a loneliness that had escaped him before.

As he stood wavering a cab passed slowly down the street. The sight of a well dressed man roused the cabman. Flicking his whip, he passed Chilcote close, feigning to pull up.

The cab suggested civilization. Chilcote's mind veered suddenly, and he raised his hand. The vehicle stopped, and he climbed in.

"Where, sir?" The cabman peered down through the roof door.

Chilcote raised his head. "Oh, anywhere near Pall Mall," he said. Then, as the horse started forward, he put up his hand and shook the trapdoor. "Wait!" he called. "I've changed my mind. Drive to Cadogan gardens, No. 32."

The distance to Cadogan Gardens was covered quickly. Chilcote had hardly realized that his destination was reached when the cab pulled up. Paying out a coin, he paid the fare and walked quickly to the hall door of No. 32.

"Is Lady Astrupp at home?" he asked sharply as the door swung back in answer to his knock.

The servant bent back deferentially. "Her ladyship has almost finished lunch, sir," he said.

For some reason Chilcote stepped through the doorway and walked halfway across the hall.

"All right," he said. "But don't disturb her on my account. I'll wait in the white room till she has finished," and, without awaiting further notice of the servant, he began to mount the stairs.

In the room where he had chosen to wait a pleasant wood fire brightened the dull January afternoon and softened the thick white curtains, the gilt furniture and the venetian vases filled with white roses. Moving straight forward, Chilcote passed by the grate and stretched his hands to the blaze; then, with his usual instability, he turned and passed to a couch that stood a yard or two away.

On the couch, tucked away between a novel and a crystal casting ball, was a white Persian kitten, fast asleep. Chilcote picked up the ball and held it between his eyes and the fire, then he laughed superficially, tossed it back into its place and caught the kitten's tail. The little animal stirred, stretched itself and began to purr. At the same moment the door of the room opened.

Chilcote turned around. "I particularly said you were not to be disturbed," he began. "How is it I merited displeasure?" He spoke fast, with the uneasy tone that so often underran his words.

Lady Astrupp took his hand with a confiding gesture and smiled.

"Never displeasure," she said lingeringly, and again she smiled. The smile might have struck a close observer as faintly artificial. But what man in Chilcote's frame of mind has time to be observant where women are concerned? The manner of the smile was very sweet and almost caressing, and that sufficed.

"What have you been doing?" she asked after a moment. "I thought I was quite forgotten." She moved across to the couch, picked up the kitten and kissed it. "Isn't this sweet?" she added.

She looked very graceful as she turned, holding the little animal up. She was a woman of twenty-seven, but she looked a girl. The outline of her face was pure, the pale gold of her hair almost ethereal, and her tall, slight figure still suggested the suppleness, the possibility of future development, that belong to youth. She wore a lace colored gown that harmonized with the room and with the delicacy of her skin.

"Now sit down and rest or walk about the room. I shan't mind which." She nestled into the couch and picked up the crystal ball.

"What is the toy for?" Chilcote looked at her from the mantelpiece, almost which he leaned. He had never defined the precise attraction that Lillian Astrupp held for him. Her loveliness soothed him; her inconsequent egotism helped him to forget himself. She never asked him for help, she never suspected his possibilities. She let him come and go and act as he pleased, never demanding reasons. Like the kitten, she was charming and graceful and easily amused. It was possible that, like the kitten, she could scratch and be spiteful on occasion, but that did not weigh with him. He appreciated with a vague envy of the late Lord Astrupp, but even had circumstances permitted it he doubted whether he would have chosen to be his successor. Lillian as a friend was delightful, but Lillian as a wife would have been a different consideration.

"What is the toy for?" he asked again.

He looked up slowly. "How cruel of you, Jack! It is my very latest hobby."

It was part of her attraction that she was never without a craze. Each new one was as fleeting as the last, but to each she brought the same delightfully insincere enthusiasm, the same picturesque devotion. Each was a pose, but she posed so sweetly that nobody lost patience.

"You mustn't laugh," she protested, letting the kitten fall to the ground. "I've had lessons at 5 guineas each from the most fascinating person—a professional one. I'm becoming quite an adept. Of course I haven't been much beyond the milky Aquarium yet, but the appearances are very promising, you know. The rest will come. I am trying to persuade Blanche to let me have a pavilion at her party in March and gaze for all you dull political people." And she smiled.

Chilcote smiled as well. "How is it done?" he asked, momentarily amused.

"Oh, the doing is quite delicious. You sit at a table with the ball in front of you. Then you take the subject's hands, spread them out on the table and stroke them very softly while you gaze into the crystal. That gets up the sympathy, you know." She looked up innocently. "Shall I show you?"

Chilcote moved a small table nearer to the couch and spread his hands upon it, palms downward. "Like this, eh?" he said. Then a ridiculousness seized him, and he moved away. "Some other day," he said quickly. "You can show me some other day. I'm not very fit this afternoon."

If Lillian felt any disappointment she showed none. "Poor old thing!" she said softly. "Try to sit here by me and we won't bother about anything." She made a place for him beside her, and as he dropped into it she took his hand and patted it sympathetically.

This touch of human pathos was the last thing needful to complete Chilcote's undoing. After a moment she lifted the hand with a little exclamation of concern.

"You degenerate person! You have ceased to manicure. What has become of your excellent training?"

Chilcote laughed. "Run to seed," he said lightly. Then his expression and tone changed. "What a man you are, my age," he added, "little social luxuries don't seem worth while. The social necessities are irksome enough. Personally I envy the beggar in the street—exempt from shaving, exempt from wristbands."

Lillian raised her delicate eyebrows. The sentiment was beyond her perception.

"But manicuring," she said reproachfully, "when you have such nice hands. It was your hands and your eyes, you know, that first appealed to me." She paused gently, with a touch of sentimental remembrance. "And I thought it so strong of you not to wear rings. It must be such a temptation." She looked down at her own fingers, glittering with jewels.

But the momentary pleasure of her touch was gone. Chilcote drew away his hand and picked up the book that lay beside him.

"'Other Men's Shoes,'" he read. "A novel, of course?"

She smiled. "Of course. Such a fantastic story—two men changing identities!"

Chilcote rose and walked back to the mantelpiece.

"Changing identities," he said, with a touch of interest.

"Yes. One man is an artist, the other a millionaire. One wants to know what fame is like, the other wants to know how it feels to be really awfully rich. So they exchange experiences for a month." She laughed.

Chilcote laughed as well. "But how?" he asked.

Oh, I told you the idea was absurd. Fancy two people so much alike that neither their friends nor their servants see any difference! Such a thing couldn't be, could it?"

Chilcote looked down at the fire. "No," he said decidedly. "No. I suppose not."

"Of course not. There are likenesses, but not close likenesses like that."

Chilcote's head was bent as he spoke, but at the last words he lifted it.

"By Jove! I don't know about that!" he said. "Not so very long ago I saw two men so much alike that I—I"— He stopped.

Lillian smiled.

He colored quickly. "You doubt me?" he asked.

"My dear Jack!" Her voice was delicately reproachful.

"Then you will admit that my—my imagination has been playing me tricks?"

"My dear boy! Nothing of the kind. Come back to your chair and tell me the whole tale?" She smiled again, and patted the couch invitingly.

But Chilcote's balance had been upset. For the first time he saw Lillian as one of the wakeful, suspecting crowd before which he was constantly on guard. Acting on the sensation, he moved suddenly toward the door.

"I have an appointment at the house," he said quickly. "I'll look in another day when—when I'm better company. I know I'm a bear today. My nerves, you know." He came back to the couch and took her hand. Then he touched her cheek for an instant with his fingers.

"Goodby," he said. "Take care of yourself—and the kitten," he added with forced gayety, as he crossed the room.

That afternoon Chilcote's nervous condition reached its height. All day he had avoided the climax, but no longer could he defer it, and this he realized as he sat in his place on the opposition benches during the last hour of wintry twilight that precedes the turning on of the lights. He realized it in that hour's debate on the application of the knowledge followed later, when the time came for him to question the government on certain points relating to the proposed additional dry dock at Talkey, the naval base. Then he knew that the sum total of the sufferings of the past months could have a visible as well as a hidden side—could disorganize his daily routine as they had already demoralized his will and character.

The thing came upon him with extraordinary lack of preparation. He sat through the twilight with tolerable calm, his nervousness showing only in the occasional little jar of his head to his collar and the frequent changing of his position, but when the lights were turned on and he leaned back in his seat with closed eyes he became conscious of a curious impression—a disturbing idea that though his closed lids he could see the faces on the opposite side of the house, see the rows of eyes, keen, interested or vigilant. Never before had the sensation presented itself, but once set up it ran through all his susceptibilities. By an absurd freak of fancy those varying eyes seemed to pierce through his lids, through his bone eyeballs. The cold perspiration that was his daily horror broke out on his forehead, and at the same moment his hands, his sender, turned, leaned over the back of his seat and touched his knee.

Chilcote started and opened his eyes. "I—I believe I was dozing," he said confusedly.

Tride smiled his dry, kindly smile. "A fatal admission for a member of the opposition," he said. "But I was looking for you earlier in the day. Your man said you were not to be disturbed, but I thought you would like to know that the Wark timber contract is settled. Craig-Burnage are rather clamoring for an answer." He moved forward and laid the papers he was carrying on the table beside Chilcote. "I'm sorry to be such a nuisance," he added, "I hope your nerves aren't worrying you today?"

Chilcote was toying with the papers. Time passed. A servant came into the room to remove the breakfast. Chilcote moved slightly when necessary, but otherwise retained his attitude. The servant, having finished his task, replenished the fire and left the room. Chilcote still sat on.

At last, feeling unabashed, he rose and crossed to the fireplace. The clock on the mantelpiece stared him in the face. He looked at it intently and slightly drew out his watch. Watch and clock corresponded. Each marked 12 o'clock. With a nervous, hurried movement he turned and pressed the electric bell long and hard.

"I understand, sir."

But before the words had been properly spoken Chilcote had passed the man and walked into the hall.

"I feel that for sixpence I'd chuck it all."

LEAVING his house, Chilcote walked forward quickly and aimlessly. With the sting of the cold air on his face the events of last night's adventure came back upon him. It was possible that, like the kitten, she could scratch and be spiteful on occasion, but that did not weigh with him. He appreciated with a vague envy of the late Lord Astrupp, but even had circumstances permitted it he doubted whether he would have chosen to be his successor. Lillian as a friend was delightful, but Lillian as a wife would have been a different consideration.

"What is the toy for?" he asked again.

He looked up slowly. "How cruel of you, Jack! It is my very latest hobby."

It was part of her attraction that she was never without a craze. Each new one was as fleeting as the last, but to each she brought the same delightfully insincere enthusiasm, the same picturesque devotion. Each was a pose, but she posed so sweetly that nobody lost patience.

"You mustn't laugh," she protested, letting the kitten fall to the ground. "I've had lessons at 5 guineas each from the most fascinating person—a professional one. I'm becoming quite an adept. Of course I haven't been much beyond the milky Aquarium yet, but the appearances are very promising, you know. The rest will come. I am trying to persuade Blanche to let me have a pavilion at her party in March and gaze for all you dull political people." And she smiled.

Chilcote smiled as well. "How is it done?" he asked, momentarily amused.

"Oh, the doing is quite delicious. You sit at a table with the ball in front of you. Then you take the subject's hands, spread them out on the table and stroke them very softly while you gaze into the crystal. That gets up the sympathy, you know." She looked up innocently. "Shall I show you?"

Chilcote moved a small table nearer to the couch and spread his hands upon it, palms downward. "Like this, eh?" he said. Then a ridiculousness seized him, and he moved away. "Some other day," he said quickly. "You can show me some other day. I'm not very fit this afternoon."

If Lillian felt any disappointment she showed none. "Poor old thing!" she said softly. "Try to sit here by me and we won't bother about anything." She made a place for him beside her, and as he dropped into it she took his hand and patted it sympathetically.

This touch of human pathos was the last thing needful to complete Chilcote's undoing. After a moment she lifted the hand with a little exclamation of concern.

"You degenerate person! You have ceased to manicure. What has become of your excellent training?"

Chilcote laughed. "Run to seed," he said lightly. Then his expression and tone changed. "What a man you are, my age," he added, "little social luxuries don't seem worth while. The social necessities are irksome enough.

"'Other Men's Shoes,'" he read.

Personally I envy the beggar in the street—exempt from shaving, exempt from wristbands."

Lillian raised her delicate eyebrows. The sentiment was beyond her perception.

"But manicuring," she said reproachfully, "when you have such nice hands. It was your hands and your eyes, you know, that first appealed to me." She paused gently, with a touch of sentimental remembrance. "And I thought it so strong of you not to wear rings. It must be such a temptation." She looked down at her own fingers, glittering with jewels.

But the momentary pleasure of her touch was gone. Chilcote drew away his hand and picked up the book that lay beside him.

"'Other Men's Shoes,'" he read. "A novel, of course?"

She smiled. "Of course. Such a fantastic story—two men changing identities!"

Chilcote rose and walked back to the mantelpiece.

"Changing identities," he said, with a touch of interest.

"Yes. One man is an artist, the other a millionaire. One wants to know what fame is like, the other wants to know how it feels to be really awfully rich. So they exchange experiences for a month." She laughed.

Chilcote laughed as well. "But how?" he asked.

Oh, I told you the idea was absurd. Fancy two people so much alike that neither their friends nor their servants see any difference! Such a thing couldn't be, could it?"

Chilcote looked down at the fire. "No," he said decidedly. "No. I suppose not."

"Of course not. There are likenesses, but not close likenesses like that."

Chilcote's head was bent as he spoke, but at the last words he lifted it.

"By Jove! I don't know about that!" he said. "Not so very long ago I saw two men so much alike that I—I"— He stopped.

Lillian smiled.

He colored quickly. "You doubt me?" he asked.

"My dear Jack!" Her voice was delicately reproachful.

"Then you will admit that my—my imagination has been playing me tricks?"

"My dear boy! Nothing of the kind. Come back to your chair and tell me the whole tale?" She smiled again, and patted the couch invitingly.

But Chilcote's balance had been upset. For the first time he saw Lillian as one of the wakeful, suspecting crowd before which he was constantly on guard. Acting on the sensation, he moved suddenly toward the door.

"I have an appointment at the house," he said quickly. "I'll look in another day when—when I'm better company. I know I'm a bear today. My nerves, you know." He came back to the couch and took her hand. Then he touched her cheek for an instant with his fingers.

"Goodby," he said. "Take care of yourself—and the kitten," he added with forced gayety, as he crossed the room.

That afternoon Chilcote's nervous condition reached its height. All day he had avoided the climax, but no longer could he defer it, and this he realized as he sat in his place on the opposition benches during the last hour of wintry twilight that precedes the turning on of the lights. He realized it in that hour's debate on the application of the knowledge followed later, when the time came for him to question the government on certain points relating to the proposed additional dry dock at Talkey, the naval base. Then he knew that the sum total of the sufferings of the past months could have a visible as well as a hidden side—could disorganize his daily routine as they had already demoralized his will and character.

The thing came upon him with extraordinary lack of preparation. He sat through the twilight with tolerable calm, his nervousness showing only in the occasional little jar of his head to his collar and the frequent changing of his position, but when the lights were turned on and he leaned back in his seat with closed eyes he became conscious of a curious impression—a disturbing idea that though his closed lids he could see the faces on the opposite side of the house, see the rows of eyes, keen, interested or vigilant. Never before had the sensation presented itself, but once set up it ran through all his susceptibilities. By an absurd freak of fancy those varying eyes seemed to pierce through his lids, through his bone eyeballs. The cold perspiration that was his daily horror broke out on his forehead, and at the same moment his hands, his sender, turned, leaned over the back of his seat and touched his knee.

Chilcote started and opened his eyes. "I—I believe I was dozing," he said confusedly.

Tride smiled his dry, kindly smile. "A fatal admission for a member of the opposition," he said. "But I was looking for you earlier in the day. Your man said you were not to be disturbed, but I thought you would like to know that the Wark timber contract is settled. Craig-Burnage are rather clamoring for an answer." He moved forward and laid the papers he was carrying on the table beside Chilcote. "I'm sorry to be such a nuisance," he added, "I hope your nerves aren't worrying you today?"

Chilcote was toying with the papers. Time passed. A servant came into the room to remove the breakfast. Chilcote moved slightly when necessary, but otherwise retained his attitude. The servant, having finished his task, replenished the fire and left the room. Chilcote still sat on.

At last, feeling unabashed, he rose and crossed to the fireplace. The clock on the mantelpiece stared him in the face. He looked at it intently and slightly drew out his watch. Watch and clock corresponded. Each marked 12 o'clock. With a nervous, hurried movement he turned and pressed the electric bell long and hard.

Instantly a servant answered.

"Is Mr. Blessington in the study?" Chilcote asked.

"He was there, sir, five minutes back."

Chilcote looked relieved.

"All right. Tell him I have gone out—had to go out. Something important. You understand?"

"I understand, sir."

But before the words had been properly spoken Chilcote had passed the man and walked into the hall.

Cromwell table, and on the plain deal bookshelves and along the mantelpiece were some valuable books—medical and historical. There were no curtains on the windows and a common reading lamp with a green shade stood on a desk. It was the room of a man with few hobbies and no pleasures, who existed because he was alive and worked because he must.

There sat after the great Sir John Loder sat by his desk in the light of the green shaded lamp. "The remains of a very frugal supper stood on the center table, and in the grate a small and economical looking fire was burning.

Having written for close on two hours, he pushed back his chair and stretched his cramped muscles. Then he yawned, rose and slowly walked across the room. Reaching the mantelpiece he took a pipe from the pipe-rack and some tobacco from the jar that stood behind the books. His face looked tired and a little worn, as is common with men who have worked long at an uncongenial task. Shredding the tobacco between his hands he slowly filled the pipe, then lighted it from the fire with a spill of twisted paper.

Almost at the moment that he applied the light the sound of steps mounting the uncarpeted stairs outside caught his attention and he raised his head to listen.

Presently the steps halted and he heard a match struck. The stranger was evidently uncertain of his whereabouts. Then the steps moved forward again and paused.

An expression of surprise crossed Loder's face and he laid down his pipe. As the visitor knocked he walked quietly across the room and opened the door.

The passage outside was dark and the newcomer drew back before the light from the room.

"Mr. Loder?" he began inferiorly. Then all at once he laughed in embarrassed apology. "Forgive me," he said. "The light rather dazzled me. I didn't realize who it was."

Loder recognized the voice as belonging to his acquaintance of the fog.

"Oh, it's you?" he said. "Won't you come in?" His voice was a little cold. This sudden resurrection left him surprised, and not quite pleasantly surprised. He walked back to the fireplace, followed by his guest.

The guest seemed nervous and ill-at-ease. "I must apologize for the hour of my visit," he said. "My—my time is not quite my own."

Loder waved his hand. "Whose time is his own?" he said.

Chilcote, encouraged by the remark, drew a chair to the fire. Until this moment he had refrained from looking directly at his host. Now, however, he raised his eyes, and, despite his preoccupation, he recorded immediately before the extraordinary resemblance. Seen here, in the light and surroundings of his badly furnished and crudely lighted room, it was rather more astounding than it had been in the mystery of the fog.

"I'm sorry me," he said again. "It is physical, purely physical. I am bowled over against my will."

Loder smiled. The slight contempt that Chilcote had first inspired rose again and with it a second feeling less easily defined. The man seemed so impossible a personality, yet so grotesquely suggestive of himself.

"I'm ill. I—I—is rather overwhelming," he said, "but not nearly enough to sink under. Come nearer the fire. What brought you here? Curiosity?" There was a sudden arrogance in the fire-place. He indicated it with a wave of the hand, then turned and took up his smouldering pipe.

Chilcote watching him furtively, echoed the gesture and sat down.

"It—it's extraordinary," he said, as if unable to dismiss the subject. "It—it is quite extraordinary?"

The other glanced round. "Let's drop it," he said. "It's so confoundedly obvious. Then his tone changed. "Won't you smoke?" he asked.

"Thanks." Chilcote began to fumble for his cigarettes.

Loder had forestalled him. Taking a box from the mantelpiece, he held it out.

"My own extravagance" he said ironically. "My resources bind me to one; and I think I have made a wise selection. It is about the only vice we haven't to pay for six times over." He glanced sharply at the face so absurdly like his own, then, finding a fresh spill, offered his guest a light.

Chilcote negotiated his cigarette and leaned forward. In the flare of the taper his face looked set and anxious, but Loder saw that the lips did not twitch as they had done on the pre-vious occasion that he had given him a light, and a look of comprehension crept into his eyes.

"What, will you have, or, rather, will you have a whisky? I keep nothing else. Hospitality is one of the declared luxuries."

Chilcote shook his head. "I seldom drink. But don't let that deter you."

Loder smiled. "I have one drink in the twenty-four hours—generally at 2 o'clock, when my night's work is done. A solitary man has to look where he is going."

"You work till 2?"

"Two or 3."

Chilcote's eyes wandered to the desk. "You write?" he asked.

The other nodded curtly.

"Books?" Chilcote's tone was anxious.

Loder laughed, and the bitter note showed in his voice.

"No; not books," he said.

Chilcote leaned back in his chair and passed his hand across his face. The strong waves of satisfaction that the words woke in him was difficult to conceal.

"What is your work?"

Loder turned aside. "You must not ask that," he said shortly. "When a man has only one capacity for the time capacity has no outlet, he is apt to run to seed in a single direction. I cultivate weeds, at abominable labor and a very small reward." He stood with his back to the fire, facing his visitor. His attitude was a curious blending of public coldness and despondency.

Chilcote leaned forward again. "Why speak of yourself like that? You are a man of intelligence and education." He spoke questioningly, anxiously.

"Intelligence and education!" Loder laughed shortly. "London is cemented with intelligence. And education! What is education? Just enough—not necessary to presentation, the wig and gown necessary to the barrister. But do the wig and gown necessarily mean briefs or the court dress royal favor? Education is the accessory. It is influence—that is essential. You should know that."

Chilcote moved restlessly in his seat. "You talk bitterly," he said.

The other looked up. "I think bitterly, which is worse. I am one of the unthinking beggars who in the expectation of money have been denied a profession—even a trade, to which to cling in time of shipwreck—and who when disaster comes drift out to sea. I warned you the other night to steer clear of me. I come under the head of flotsam."

Chilcote's face lighted. "You came a cropper?" he asked.

"No. It was some one else who came the cropper. I only dealt in results."

"The results?"

"A drop from a probable £50,000 to a certain £600."

Chilcote glanced up. "How did you take it?" he asked.

"I? Oh, I was twenty-five then. I had a good many hopes and a lot of pride; but there is no place for either in a 'crash.'"

"But your people?"

"My last relation died with the forties."

"Your friends?"

Loder laid down his pipe. "I told you I was twenty-five," he said, with the tinge of humor that sometimes crossed his manner. "Doesn't that explain itself? Friends were taken favors in prosperity. A chance of fortune, not likely to alter my ways. As I have said, I was twenty-five." He smiled. "When I realized my position I sold all my belongings with the exception of a table and a few books—which I stored. I put on a walking suit and let my beard grow. Then, with my entire capital in my pocket, I left England without saying goodby to any one."

"For how long?"

"Oh, for six years. I wandered half over Europe and through a good part of Asia in the time."

"And then?"

"Then? Oh, I shaved off the beard and came back to London." He looked at Chilcote, partly contemptuous, partly amused at his curiosity.

But Chilcote sat staring in silence. The domination of the other's personality and the futility of his elaborate statements baffled him.

Loder saw his bewilderment. "You wonder what the devil I came into the world for," he said. "I sometimes wonder the same myself."

At his words a change passed over Chilcote. He half rose, then dropped back into his seat.

"You have no friends?" he said.

"Your life is worth nothing to you?"

"No more than it was worth," I thought I had conveyed that impression."

"You are absolutely free man."

"No man is free who works for his bread. If things had been different I might have been in such shoes as yours, succeeding in legislative by-ways. My hobby was politics at once. But hopes, like more substantial things, belong to the past". He stopped abruptly and looked at his companion.

The change in Chilcote had become more acute. He sat lingering his cigarette, his brows drawn down, his lips set nervously in a conflict of emotions. For a space they stayed very still, studying Loder's eyes; then, as if decision had suddenly come to him, he turned and met his gaze.

"How if there was a future," he said, "as well as a past?"

CHAPTER V.

FOR the space of a minute there was silence in the room; then outside in the still night three clocks simultaneously chimed 11, and their announcement was taken up and echoed by half a dozen others, loud and faint, hoarse and resonant, for all through the hours of darkness the neighborhood of Fleet street is alive with chimes.

Chilcote, startled by the jangle, rose from his seat. Then, as if ashamed by an uncontrollable impulse, he spoke again.

"You probably think I am mad"— he began.

Loder took his pipe out of his mouth. "I am not so presumptuous," he said quietly.

For a space the other eyed him stolidly, then, still trying to gauge his thoughts. Then once more he broke into speech.

"Loder, hear," he said. "I came to-night to make a proposition. When I have made it you'll first of all jeer at me, as I jeered when I made it to myself. Then you'll see in it the most easy haste of his speech his words broke off almost unintelligibly.

Involuntarily Loder lifted his head to retort, but Chilcote put up his hand. His face was set with the obstinate determination that week men sometimes exhibit.

"Before I begin I want to say that I am not mad—neither am I drunk." He looked fully at his companion with his restless glance. "I am quite sane—quite reasonable."

Again Loder essayed to speak, but again he put up his hand.

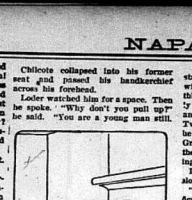
"No. Hear me out. You told me something of your story. I'll tell you something of mine. You'll be the second person, man or woman, that I have confided in for ten years. You say you have been trusted shabbily, I have trusted myself shabbily, which is harder to overcome. I had every chance, and I chucked every chance away."

There was a strained pause, then again Loder lifted his head.

"Morphia?" he said very quietly.

Chilcote's face changed with a scared gesture. "How did you know that?" he asked sharply.

The other smiled. It wasn't guessing. It wasn't even deduction. You told me or as good as told me in the fog when we talked of Lexington. You were unstrung that night, and well, perhaps one gets overobservant from living alone." He smiled again.



"Why don't you drop the thing?"

Why don't you drop the thing before it gets too late?" His face was unsympathetic, and there was no question in his voice by a note of hardness.

Chilcote returned his glance. The suggestion of reproof had accentuated his pallor. Under his excitement he looked ill and worn.

"You might talk till doomsday, but every word would be wasted," he said irritably. "I'm past praying for by something like six years."

"Then why come here?" Loder was pulling hard on his pipe. "I'm not a dealer in sympathy."

"I don't require sympathy." Chilcote rose again. He was still agitated, but the agitation was quieter. "I want a much more expensive thing than sympathy, and I am willing to pay for it."

Loder looked at him coldly. "I want much more expensive thing than sympathy, and I am willing to pay for it."

He also rose and looked at him. "I have no possession in the world that would be worth a fiver to you," he said coldly. "You're either under a delusion or you're wasting my time."

Chilcote laughed nervously. "Wait," he said. "Wait. I only ask you to wait. First let me sketch you my proposition. It won't take many words."

"My grandfather was a Chilcote of Westmoreland. He was one of the first of his day and his class to recognize that there was a future in trade, so, breaking his own little way from the family tree, he went south to Wark and entered a shipowning firm. In thirty years' time he died, the owner of one of the biggest trades in England, leaving married the daughter of his chief. My father was twenty-four and still at Oxford when he inherited. Almost his first act was to reverse my grandfather's early move by going north and piecing together the family friendship. He married his first cousin, and then, with the Chilcote prestige revived and the shipping money to back it, he entered on his ambition, which was to represent East Wark in the Conservative interest. It was a big fight, but he won—as much by personal influence as by money. He was an aristocrat, but he was a keen business man as well. The combination carries weight with your class constituency. He never did much in the house, but he was a power to his party in Wark. They still use his name there to conjure with."

Loder leaned forward interestedly. "Yes?" Chilcote paused. "I have heard of him. One of those fine, unostentatious figures—strong in action, a little narrow in outlook, perhaps, but essential to a country's staying power. You have every reason to be proud of your father."

Chilcote laughed suddenly. "How easily we sum up when a matter is impersonal. My father may have been a fine figure, but he shouldn't have left me to climb to his pedestal."

Loder's eyes questioned. In his newly awakened interest he had let his pipe go out.

"You don't see your way meaning?" Chilcote went on. "My father died and I was elected for East Wark. You may say that if I had no real inclination for the position I could have refused. I can tell you I couldn't. Every local interest, political and commercial, hung up on the election. I was only twenty-one, did what eight men out of ten would have done. I yielded to pressure."

"It was a fine opening" The words escaped Loder.

"Most prisons have wide gates," Chilcote laughed again unpleasantly. "That was six years ago. I had started on the morphia track four years earlier, but up to my father's death I kept it under my thumb, or believed I had, and in the realization of my new responsibilities and the excitement of the political fight I almost put it aside. For several months after I entered parliament I worked. I believe I made one speech that marked me as a coming man." He laughed derisively. "I even married."

"Married?"

"Yes—a girl of nineteen, the ward of a great politician. It was a brilliant marriage, politically as well as socially, but it didn't work. I was born without the capacity for love. First the social life palled on me, then my work stopped irksome. There was only one factor to make life endurable—morphia. Before that month's end but I had fully admitted that."

"But your wife?"

"Oh, my wife knew nothing—knows nothing. It is the political business, the beastly routine of the political life, that is wearing me down. I stop temporarily, then—hurried on again. "I tell you it's hard to see the same faces, to sit in the same seat day in, day out, knowing all the time that you must hold yourself in hand, must keep your grip on the reins."

"It is always possible to apply for the Chiltern Hundreds."

"To retire? Possible to retire?" Chilcote broke into a loud, sarcastic laugh. "You don't know what the local prejudice is for a place like Wark stands for. Twenty times I have been within an ace of handing the whole thing. Once last year I wrote privately to Vale, one of our big men there, and hinted that my health was bad. Two hours after he had read my letter he was in my study. Had I been in Greenland the result would have been the same. No; resignation is a means ingless word to a man like me."

Loder looked down. "I see," he said slowly; "I see."

"Then you see everything—the difficulty, the isolation of the position. Five years ago—three years ago—I was able to calculate—to count upon myself to some extent—but yesterday I received a shock—yesterday I discovered that—that"—again he hesitated painfully—"that I have passed the stage when one may calculate."

The situation was growing more embarrassing. To hide its awkwardness, Loder moved back to the grate and rebuilt the fire, which had fallen low.

Chilcote, still excited by his unusual vehemence, followed him, taking up a position by the mantelpiece.

"Well?" he said, looking down.

"Well" slowly Loder rose from his task. "Well?" he reiterated.

"Have you nothing to say?"

"Nothing, except that your story is unique and that I suppose I am flattered by your confidence." His voice was intentionally brusque.

Chilcote paid no attention to the voice. Taking a step forward he laid his fingers on the lapel of Loder's coat.

"I have passed the stage where I can count upon myself," he said, "and I want to count upon somebody else. I want to keep my place in the world's eyes and yet be free"—

Loder drew back involuntarily, contempt struggling with bewilderment in his expression.

Chilcote lifted his head. "By an extraordinary chance," he said, "you can do for me what no other man in creation could do. It was suggested to me unconsciously by the story of a book—a book in which men changed identities. I saw nothing in it at the time, but this morning, as I lay in bed, sick with yesterday's fiasco, it came back to me. It rushed over my mind in an inspiration. It will save me and make you. I'm not insulting you, though you'd like to think so."

Without remark Loder freed himself from the other's touch and walked back to his desk. His anger, his pride, and, against his will, his excitement were all aroused.

He sat down, leaned his elbow on the desk and took his face between his hands. The man behind him undoubtedly talked madness; but after five years of dreary exile he was subject to fascination. Against all reason it stirred and roused him. For one instant his pride and his anger faltered before it, then common sense flowed back again and adjusted the balance.

"You can do for me what no other man in creation could do."

"You propose," he said slowly, "that for a consideration of money I should sink on the likeness between us and become your dummy, when you are otherwise engaged?"

Chilcote colored. "You are unpleasantly blunt," he said.

"But I have caught your meaning?" "In the rough, yes."

Loder nodded curtly. "Then take my advice and go home," he said; "you're unhinged."

The other returned his glance, and as their eyes met Loder was reluctantly compelled to admit that, though the face was disturbed, it had no traces of insanity.

"I make you a proposal," Chilcote repeated nervously, but with distinctness. "Do you accept?"

For an instant Loder was at a loss to find a reply adequate to the final, Chilcote broke in upon the pause.

"After all," he urged, "what I ask of you is a simple thing—merely to carry through my routine duties for a week or two occasionally when I find my endurance giving away, when a respite becomes essential. The work would be nothing to a man in your state of mind, the pay anything you like to name." In his eagerness he had followed Loder to the desk. "Won't you give me an answer? I told you I am neither mad nor drunk."

Loder pushed back the scattered papers that lay under his arm.

"Only a lunatic would propose such a scheme," he said sharply and incontinent feeling.

"Why?"

The other's lips parted for a quick retort; then in a surprising way the retort seemed to fail him. Perhaps because the thing isn't feasible, isn't practicable from any point of view?"

Chilcote stepped closer. "Why?" he insisted.

"Because if couldn't work. Chancellors of the Exchequer don't resign."

"Chilcote put out his hand and touched his arm. "But why?" he urged. "Why? Give me one unanswerable reason."

Loder shook off the hand and laughed, but there was in his laugh a suggestion of the other's excitement. Again the scene stirred him against his wonder and judgment. "I can reply when it came was sound enough.

"As for reasons," he said, "there are a hundred, if I had time to name them. Take it, for the sake of supposition, that I were to accept your offer. I should take my place in your house at—let us say at 10 o'clock next time. Your man gets me into your evening clothes, and there at the very start you have the first suspicion set you. He has probably known you for years, known you until every turn of your appearance, voice and manner is far more familiar to him than it is to you. There are no eyes like a servant's."

"I have thought of that. My servant and my secretary can both be changed. I will do the thing thoroughly."

Loder glanced at him in surprise. The madness had more method than he had believed. "Let me see," he said, at a fresh idea struck him, and he laughed.——

"You have entirely forgotten one thing," he said. "You can hardly dismiss your wife."

"My wife doesn't count."

Again Loder laughed. "I'm afraid I scarcely agree. The complications would be slightly—slightly"— He paused.

Chilcote's latent irritability broke out suddenly. "Look here," he said, "this isn't a chaffing matter. It may be moonshine to you, but it's reality to me."

Again Loder took his face between his hands.

"Don't ridicule the idea. I'm in dead earnest."

Loder said nothing.

"Think—think it over before you refuse."

VALUE OF EXAMPLE

SELF-DENIAL AND RESTRAINT OUR DUTY TO OTHERS.

REASONS FOR SELF-SACRIFICE

Christians Must Take Care Not to Offend — Questions of Ritual — Nonessentials Have Their Importance —Every Man a "Crooked Stick" More or Less—Pour Oil on Troubled Waters.

Entered according to Act of Parliament of Canada, in the year 1907, by Frederick Haultain, Toronto, at the Dept. of Agriculture, Ottawa.

Los Angeles, Cal., April 7.—In this sermon the preacher teaches the value of self denial and the importance of restraining ourselves from indulgences which, though harmful or not in themselves, might make us a stumbling block to others. The text is 1 Corinthians viii, 13. "If meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth."

Corinth, beautiful Corinth, favored with thy legends of ancient times; with thy Acrocorinthus crowning the nerve centre of two continents, for there the merchantmen of Europe and Asia gathered within thy gates; with its Aero-Corinthus rising 1,900 feet high, crowned with a frowning fortress aptly called "the Gibraltar of the east;" Corinth with its great amphitheatre, where the Corinthian youths men and where the gladiators' blood mingled with the blood of the savage beasts slain in demoniac struggles; Corinth with its Poseidonium, where the famous Isthmian games took place, from which arena Paul fathered many of his gospel arrows to drive home his divine message; Corinth with its most famous temple of the old world looming above many beautiful shrines—oh, Corinth, beautiful Corinth, opulent Corinth armed with aesthetic Corinth, no Wonder Paul wanted to go and see thee and preach the Christ within thy gates!

The shrines and the idols must have been everywhere when Paul first went to Corinth. They must have been in multitudinous as are the idols to-day in Japan. Temples like the sacred Ganges for millions. These Corinthian idols must have been on every hand, in the temples, in the streets, must have been in every street and in every house, in every fireside. Idols, idols, idols, everywhere. Idols must have been crowding each other in old Corinth. Idols of every nature as they did in Athens. Truly Corinth was the home of commerce and literature and art, but it was there that it had been set one of the great ancient Meccas of idolatry.

Now, there was a very strange Corinthian custom of idol worship which may have been peculiar to Corinth. Incense can readily grasp, because there were altars as sacrificial tables. Incense than priests at stated times of the day, morning, noon and sheet and every certain parts of the dead bodies of animals upon the altars of their idols. There had been a custom of years for some four or five hours. Of course the idol was supposed to partake for the meat to spoil. Then this meat was taken off the altars and sold to the people. Because the meat was placed upon the shrines of the idols it was looked upon with prejudice by many people and had to be sold in the Corinthian markets at a very reduced rate. Now, Paul was a man of very uncommon common sense. He said practically: "If you don't have to support myself by tentmaking, if I may meat cheaper, I can live cheaper, because I am single, and I can go and earn a living, and I will be able to give more time to preach Jesus Christ." Then Paul again said: "I also should I not eat this meat which once lay upon these altars? It is now tainted meat. I can buy it for half the price of other meat. Yes, while I stay here in the Corinthian capital I will buy this meat and eat this meat, because it is good and wholesome and the cheapest of all meats."

But in that Corinthian capital there were a lot of very narrow minded Christians. Their minds were so narrow and their souls were so bigoted that they were always ready to place the magnifying glass to their eye and to find upon a sacrificial piece of meat make it loom up before them as a huge mountain of error. These narrow minded bigots had a mania for splitting hairs. They could argue for days and weeks upon a single trivial question, and they rose up in protest against Paul buying and eating the meat from off the heathen altars. "Why," I can hear them say, "Paul, if you eat that meat you are practically an idol worshiper. You are the same as one who bows in worship at the shrine of the licentious Venus. You are just as bad as any of these idolatrous people." "All right," says Paul; "if you look at it in that way, I will stop eating the sacrificial meat. I am ever willing to sacrifice my rights if wrong for me to eat it, but I am going to stop because some of you Christians believe it to be wrong. I will not be a spiritual stumbling block to any one." Then Paul writes these words of my text: "Wherefore if meat make my brother to offend I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend." Oh, did you ever know a man to take a wiser stand for Christ than did Paul in that sentence? Can we not in just as true and as faithful in regarding in nonessentials for Christ's sake as was Paul when he yielded to the exaggerations of the ancient Christians in old Corinth?

Now let us try to analyze some of the characteristics of Paul's character which this decision indicates. In the first place, I would remind you that Paul was a gospel evangelist, who made every thought, every act, every desire of his body, mind and soul converge to the one purpose of preaching Jesus Christ to the world and of bringing lost men to know at the cross of Christ. He was not a consecrated dentist upon the altar of soul of humanity to be driven about by every stormy wind and to be beaten off his course by every opposing current. When a principle was at stake, you could not swerve Paul from his course. There never was a gospel preacher who hewed closer to the straight line of truth than did this man Paul.

Come, let us look a little closer at this meat. Do you suppose Paul personally liked to eat this meat from off the heathen altars? I think not. Would you have liked to eat it? No; you would no more have desired to eat that meat than you would like to eat the flesh of some animals killed in a Spanish bullfight. That was the way, I think, Paul felt when he decided upon the meat which was taken off the heathen altars. He says that he believe he could divorce that meat from its vile associations. Neither could you.

When Paul saw that meat, there loomed up before him the beautiful Greek temple dedicated to the worship of Venus. That worship was the most bestial and debasing and universally corrupt of any temple in the east, paralleling the worship of ancient Baal. So corrupt was the worship that for centuries the name of a Corinthian was a synonym for debauchery. But, though every refined sensibility of Paul revolted from touching that idol meat, I think I hear Paul say: "Well, I looks at it: "Paul, you do not want that meat, but you could buy it at a tainted. It will give strength of muscle and of brain. Remember, Paul, if you buy this meat cheaper there will be less need for your long hours now devoted to tentmaking, and then you will have longer time to preach Jesus Christ." So Paul bought that meat. So Paul stifled every repugnant feeling which he might have in order to be able to preach the gospel further and preach Jesus Christ to the people of Corinth. Even in his food he economized in order that he might become a flaming evangelist. Oh, my brother, our whole lives, every thought of our whole lives, every deed is to be to bring the message of the cross nearer to the hearts of men, as Paul did in the market place of Corinth!

But, though Paul was not like a spiritual weakling, he was not content in this way and that by every popular prayer meeting, but he said he would change when there was sufficient cause. Paul was ready and willing to yield about nonessentials if thereby he could win the good will of his fellow men and that good will make men more willing to hear about his message. He was not one of those sectarianist stickers who want to carry the whole world into a religious straitjacket and compel others to think as he thought and do as he did. Paul knew there are some people born in this world who have no use for any respect for the individuality of other people.

They are so convinced that theirs is the right way to worship God that they demand that every fellow man worship him in the same way with the same liturgy and using the same hymns book and with the same ritual. They say, "If you do not do as I do and wear the ecclesiastical gown and my surplice, hood, cassock and alb, then you are not true Christians." Now, it was men of this kind that were worrying Paul about this trifle of meat, meat that had been offered to idols. As he told them, it was really nothing in the world," and the meat offered to God had been blessed and offered. But he saw that opposition to it aroused their thoughts from the higher questions of faith and holiness, so he yielded to them, that they might be saved from sin and from eternal things. Some of the questions of ritual that men dispute about now are of the same character as that of the sacrificial meat. We may well be charitable about them as the apostle was.

There is the good of you and I fighting about the questions of nonessentials in the Episcopalian church? What is the use? The burning question whether a priest should or should not wear a gown in the pulpit? What is the good of the heated discussion as to whether we should have a liturgy in the Methodist church or no? I tell you these things are only nonessentials. They are nonessentials as much as the questions over which the ecclesiastical world is fighting to-day are the issues. The longer I stay in the ministry the more I believe that what Richard Baxter wrote over 200 years ago is true. Listen while I read it: "The older I grow the smaller seem the cavities of the Bible and the controversies of the Christian world, the greater uncertainties in them than I first discovered. There are now few matters where there is the greater confidence than in the Lord's Prayer and the Ten Commandments are now to me as my daily bread and drink, and as I can spar with words over them again and again so I had rather read and hear of them than of any of the school disputes and I do observed also with Richard Hooker and with many other of the learned Christians that found in he could have ended that beautiful sentence thus: "And this I observed also with Paul and with many other of the saints."

If I was called to a church where the pastors for generations were accustomed to wear a gown and the people liked it, I would wear a gown. It is a nonessential. If I had a church member should come to me and say, "Pastor, the more I study the Bible the more I believe that immersion is the true baptism," I should say: "Very well. Come; you will go to a Baptist church, and I will immerse you there." If an Episcopalian should come to me and say, "I believe in the apostolic succession of the Episcopal church," I should at once reply: "All right, my brother. You are my brother, though we differ on that subject. I wish you godspeed. I do not care much whether you believe in the apostolic succession of the Episcopal church as long as you do believe in Jesus Christ as the Son of God and you do accept him as your pardoning Saviour." The doctrine of the atonement of the cross we hold to with a viselike grip of Paul. May God help us to let all the nonessentials go.

But there was still another reason why I think Paul said, "I will eat no meat." What might have been a nonessential to Paul in his spiritual life might have been more than a nonessential to some one else. Therefore I think I can hear Paul say to himself when this question came up: "Of course if I give up eating this sacrificial meat I shall have to work harder than I otherwise would. I may have to shorter hours for preaching. I may even have to work at my tentmaking trade when I return home at night. But what of it? Again I say what of it? I can afford to go to any extreme rather than put a spiritual stumbling block in the way of my fellow men. I must make my brother to offend. I will eat no meat as long as the world standeth." And Paul was right. My brothers, are you ready to firmly and unequivocally refuse to throw any spiritual stumbling block in the way of your fellow men?

Certain amusements in themselves are harmless, but these amusements on account of their evil associations may be most pernicious to others, and especially to our young people. As a whole. Theatre-going for you may be harmless, but what are the surroundings of the average theatre? If you be a church elder, if you as a church member, if you as a Sunday school teacher go to the theatre, do you not see that the example you may be setting may encourage some to go who are not morally and spiritually as strong as you are? Do you believe Jesus Christ, if he was upon earth, would ever be seen in a theatre? What would Paul say if he were living to go with you to the theatre? I know. You know. He would answer: "Nay!" If this amusement, like the sacrificial meat, causes my brother to offend, I will abstain as long as the world standeth."

How about the card table and the dance hall? You say they do no personal harm. If you indulge in them, will your personal example lead to anyone else any harm? This Lord's day I have made a most earnest plea for every man, woman and child to come to our next Wednesday night prayer meeting. You know and I know that the most essential meeting of all the church life is the midweek prayer meeting. That young man is going to be at our midweek prayer meeting because I will be there. I will be conspicuous by your absence! The next Thursday morning on his way to business he opens the paper and reads there of a big dance or progressive euchre party given in this city. The names of all the guests are printed there. The names of the prize winners are also given. Do you suppose may be among the prize winners. You will see him the same morning as the man who wins a prize at Monte Carlo or at some race track. What will he say? Will he say, "Well, if this amusement men and women of this church stay away from prayer meeting to go to the dance hall and to the card table, I must be more regular at the prayer meetings, for surely if such a condition exists in this church God knows the church needs my prayers?" Will he say that, or will he say, "If the social leaders of the church can put the valuable duties of prayer meeting, surely I may do the same?" What would Paul do if you asked him to go to a progressive euchre party or to a dance hall? I know. He would answer, "If meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth." May God teach us in our amusements not to throw spiritual stumbling blocks in the way of our fellow men.

But there is still another reason why I think Paul refused to eat that meat. When these narrow Christians came to him in protest, I think I can hear Paul say: "Well, well, brethren, you have imagined a lot of men and women could ever take such a narrow, bigoted view of so trivial a matter. Well, the old proverb is surely right which says that it takes all kinds of people to make up a world." But I must not be too abrupt and severe with these critics. Perhaps I will be more wise in my ways as they are in theirs. Now, I will go to them in a nonessential, perhaps by my example I may lead them to yield their wishes to me in an nonessential, and thus we will be able to live closer together as a church. Surely we can all afford to sacrifice for each other in nonessentials for the sake of God may be able to come together as a happy family of God." Was he not wise? If by sacrificing my nonessentials you can teach your fellow workers in the church to sacrifice their nonessentials, then truly the church of Jesus Christ will become the mighty agency of gospel power which God foreordained it to be.

I want to tell you that Paul's way of living in harmony with his neighbors and fellow Christians was the only true way to live. Don't fight. Don't antagonize each other. Don't criticize you and criticise your family and treat you unjustly, do not make an issue of it. The longer I live the more I believe that every man to some extent is a "crooked stick." He does not mean to be "crooked," but he is. You are just as peculiar in your way as some other men are in theirs. For God's sake do not eat each other up. Treat one another right and thus hurts the influence of the cross of Jesus Christ. Sacrifice everything in your power, yield every right and privilege that you can, in order to pour oil upon the troubled waters of the home, the church and the state, and make the roaring billows of hate and bitterness lie down and go to sleep. It is easy enough to start a cyclone. It is easy enough, with one little spark to explode a gunpowder magazine. Only the power of a peaceful life can still a Galilean tempest. "If meat cause my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh as long as the world standeth."

New York Letter.

New York, April 23d, 07.

130 West 31st St.

Dear Beaver,—I am sitting here with my very dear friend, Mr. Bran. Good, since the eve of the 19th and I find myself with him in the social whirl of the wealth of New York City. It has been a consuming race by day, and amusement and introduction to the theatres by night. Of course, by the time, you only I was taken by my friend to the New York Athletic Club of its finest and largest in the city, it has a membership of 5,000 and cost $2,000. The fee to join is $200, with $50 per year. Its palatial home, every thing is in it as you will like to know, and I am told it is the place for dining and especial. To Fred. Memberry.

The theatres are something wonderful. Right here in town are many of clever performances and theatrical plays. I am going to see one this evening for time in this letter. At the New Amsterdam Theatre, 42nd street, the scenes was covered with ace glittering gems and diamonds. Well as her hair being full of them, and her fingers, and her neck, and her ears, and then to hold another ring; and wasn't a lover of the fair sex could refrain from kissing her with a diamond as to look at her. And the chorus girls were beautiful, and also of great quality, and so many of them that I am told that they are made such as to be dressed over Sunday, for there is a matinee on Sunday afternoon. The scene was a ballroom, and the chorus girls were all dressed in evening dress, and the gentlemen in the same. Each put his hand under the neckband of the lady next to him, and accidentally got hold of the other's shirt.

"Its the last typhoon," said the first gentleman.

"Nothing of the kind," said the other. "Look at the diamonds."

PICKING A DUCK.

"Did you ever pack a duck?" asked a traveling man of a group of boys who is to dip the ducks in scalding water to loosen the feathers. Then they lay them in woolen blankets for fifteen minutes, and then they pick them out, not perfectly dry by that time. The feathers, of course, stick to the wet parts of the coats, will be dry and come off much as they would from a live duck. Then the little pin feathers will remain and these can be got off by rubbing and singeing.

Feathers are quite an item and the handling of duck feathers in a way to be quite an item. Right now duck, goose and chicken feathers are being marked at from thirty-two cents to forty cents per pound, and even more. In price being on account of color and quality. Feathers are classified as to fancy grade for many purposes. It is very important to know how to pick a duck. Every kind and grade of feathers is handled by our business men. Write for Feather Guide.

A QUEER ERROR.

The late Professor J. Thomas, the advertising expert of Chicago, tells a story about some doctors in an address on advertising.

"These doctors," he said, "were, the purpose of an advertising error, to have printed about one hundred cards.

"Silence was taken down very bad and the printer, a young fellow just out of town, a specialist was called in.

"The family physician was promptly recalled, and he and the specialist were closeted in the darkened chamber together. They found the man in a high fever and wandering in his mind. Each put his hand under the medicine bottle to feel the pulse, and accidentally got hold of the other's hand.

"'He has typhoid,' said the first physician.

"'Nothing of the kind,' said the other. 'Look at the diamonds.'"

MRS. GEORGE GOULD

The Home-Life at Georgian Court.

One of the most magnificent country houses in the United States is Georgian Court, at the head of the beautiful lake Carnegie, among the tall, straight kingly pines of Lakewood, N.J., and the wife and mother who makes this palace a home is Mrs. George J. Gould, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. D. Kingdon, formerly of Toronto.

The beautiful Edith Kingdon, after completing her education in England, adopted the stage as a career, and her talent, grace, charm and presence were winning recognition when in 1895 she was married to George Gould, the millionaire railway owner, and son of Jay Gould, at one time America's leading financier. Mrs. Gould soon became one of the most popular of the younger matrons of society and a leader in the world of fashion. Beautiful is the house in which she lives, but far more beautiful is the atmosphere of love, sweetness and consecration that fills the home with sunshine and happiness. It is said that wealth often dries up the fountains of fortune forgetful of the privileges and joys of motherhood, making slaves of the welfare of the children; but Mrs. Gould is a model mother to her six children, a devoted companion, confidant and friend to her husband.

The Goulds are practically the only members of the ultra-fashionable set who reside in the country the year round. Georgian Court, built of light grey brick and terra cotta in the style of the French Renaissance, lies in beautiful grounds of 600 acres, and is filled with fine marble, and the sculpture peeping from a dark mass of evergreen shrubs and bushes, is reflected in the clear waters of a lake. Surrounding the house, by the way, is the wonderful electric fountain, sixty feet in diameter, the New Creed and which is the most elaborate piece consisting of a colossal Neptune shell of bronze, forming a chariot on which stands the heroic statue of a man driving a pair of purest white horses.

Entered according to Act of the Parliament of Canada, in the year 1907, by W. C. Hoch, at the Department of Agriculture.

Zutoo

Always Cured Headache. Never Affected her Heart.

Here is a testimonial from the wife of Doctor W. L. Shurtleff, K.C., of Coaticook, Que., who has taken a thousand Zutoo Tablets (the Japanese Vegetable Headache remedy.)

It should convince any doubting one, that while the tablets cure headache, they do not, like the drug cures, affect the heart, nerves or stomach. No one would or could take such a number if they were not perfectly harmless. Mrs. Shurtleff herself had to discard the drug cures.

Here is what she says:

I have always been a great sufferer from headache, and have taken a great many headache cures. I found that after taking them for a time they caused palpitation of the heart. Three years ago I began using Zutoo. I have likely taken over a thousand tablets. I have never yet felt the least ill-effect from using them and they cure my headaches as quickly as any remedy I ever took.

They are Harmless as Soda.

CLANCY—CLANCY.

A very pretty wedding took place at the residence of Mr. John Clancy, Napanee, on Wednesday, April 17, when his daughter, Mistor Alice Gertrude, was united in marriage to Mr. Joseph Albert Clancy, of Watertown, N.Y., Rev. R. Paice officiating. The bride entered the parlor, leading on the arm of her father, to the strains of Mendelssohn's wedding march, played by Miss A. Williams, of Napanee. The ceremony was performed in an alcove formed of evergreens, and the bride looked very pretty in her wedding suit, and flowers. The bride was beautifully attired in white brocaded cashmere, with silver and valenciennes lace ribbon, and carrying a shower bouquet of white carnations and maiden hair fern. The bridesmaid was Miss Lotta M. Clancy, sister of the groom, who was also pretty, trimmed with silver and chiffon cloth and carried pink carnations. Mr. Hugh W. Milligan acted as groomsman. The congratulations had been offered and hearty wedding breakfast was served. The dining room was tastefully decorated and lighted by artificial light, looked very pretty indeed. Refreshments of pink and white ice cream, cake and candies were handed around. The table was beautifully decorated in white and green. The many congratulations and handsome presents testified to the high esteem in which the bride were held in the community. The bride received a check for a handsome money. The groom's gift to the bride was a gold chain and locket, and to the groomsman, gold cuff links. The bridesmaid received a handsome pin, and a shower of confetti, rice, etc., showered them as they left for Toronto, where they took the 6.40 train east to spend their honeymoon. They were given away in a new suit of grey panama cloth with white vest and grey overcoat, and carried out a pair of grey mohair with tails and plumes to match. All join in wishing them a long, happy and prosperous journey.

WHAT "PUM" THOUGHT OF IT.

We are permitted to publish the following letter from Mr. Fred Lapum to his mother, describing his impressions of the recent earthquake.

Mexico City, April 17th, 1907.

Dear Mother—Monday, and a funny day. I don't feel very well to-day as I had an awful experience last evening. The boys all went over to Mr. Hone's for dinner, and I went out to spend the evening at Bohan's. I arrived there about 7.30. It was a fine evening, warm weather cloudy and about 8.30. I was sitting on the porch talking to Mrs. Bohan when I felt a queer sensation come over me, and I thought the other boys were playing a trick on me, but as I was lying down I felt the bed moving sideways. I then raised up and sat on a chair. I was by the side of the window, and I looked up the light was swinging and the house started to shake; I was so frightened. The doors swung, the windows rattled, and I was sliding all about; I tried to raise, but was thrown down on the floor. It seemed to be swinging at a radius of three feet, and I expected to see it tumble in. At last I got to my feet and I crawled out of the room, and when I reached the ground, and the house fell in. Yesterday and the houses were swaying, trees tending, and the ground was undulating, going up and down like waves. At last an earthquake, and the earthquake lasted about a minute. The streets were full of people, as night approached everybody was frightened, and dressed myself properly, in case I should be called upon to run outdoor. I am no people who were asking protection in the churches. We had several more slight shocks, but nothing serious. There were no fatalities, except that hundreds of horses and mules were killed by falling walls, and broken telegraph wires. No good houses collapsed, but a number of old ones and also of adobe under construction. The pavements are all cracked, and every one looks scared. The shock was felt all over the city, from Vera Cruz and Mexico City, on account of the soft ground on the lake where the large machines show easiest to westerly shocks. We had no earthquake, but had had crose shocks it would have been a different story, but on a smaller, is like a sheet of rubber, and feels has much elasticity, which will warp protect it from serious damage as the city is built on piles, so my aunt and the next week's seem so dangerous. Everybody pants the time by their watches, and we are sending a letter to you. Now you see we are all right and that things are not as bad as they seem. I am not the one they ever had here and Isabel and Mrs. Bohan are not accustomed to earthquakes for a long time. There are people here who have been in the city for twenty years and never felt one, but they say this was a stronger shock than any of the city's earthquakes. We are all saved. I am sending papers and photographs, and will send all of the different ones I can get. Don't worry as everything is all right and no danger of anything serious, as they have those very often, and as old settlers don't think anything about them.

New Anglican Church At Morven.

LAYING OF THE CORNER STONE.

In spite of the furious wind on Monday, April 22nd, there was a very large gathering of friends and neighbors for the ceremony of Laying the Corner Stone of the new Anglican Church at Morven. Rev. Canon Jarvis and Mr. Dudley Hill, churchmaster, kindly brought out the surplised choir of St. Mary Magdalene's Church from Napanee, which added greatly to the scene of the occasion. The visiting Clergy were Rev. R. J. E. Tweedie, Rector of Bath; Rev. C. E. S. Radcliffe, Rector of Camden East; Rev. W. Jones, Rector of Tamworth, and Canon Jarvis. The Clergy and choir robed in a nice Colonial house adjoining the site and marched in procession to the School House, where the most of the service, consisting of appropriate prayers, hymns and readings, was said. The whole company then proceeded to the site and the Rev. Ronald Dean Dion presented a handsome silver trowel to Mr. Uriah Wilson, M.P. for Lennox, and requested him to lay the stone. This being done, a remark was made by the Canon Jarvis, and Rev. Stone's stirring hymn, "The Church's one Foundation" was fervently sung. A collection was then made, after which Mr. Uriah Wilson delivered an admirable, tactful and sympathetic address, full of all good wishes to give the best possible co-operation to the new church. Rev. Canon Jarvis then followed, and also addressed the meeting, first in almighty God, then the kindly courtesy of those present. When he thanked the ladies for their kindness in the gathering of materials for the tea, which certainly helped with the teaming, and especially those who provided the splendid spread. Children's babies were gratefully mentioned, and the name Dr. W. D. Ross, who had so generously donated the large granite stone. Many others were mentioned, and God's blessing invoked upon them all. Some very choice and excellent addresses were given by the visiting Clergy.

The guaranteed iron box under the stone contained copies of The Napanee Paper and Express, Kingston Daily News, Ontario Churchman, New Era, and a document giving full particulars of the Building Committee, viz., Rev. C. E. S. Radcliffe, Rector; Mr. H. Bonny, Archibald Hutton, and J. S. Wilson, and also the names of the contractors, viz., Thos. Pyrtas for the masonry, and Walter Davis for the carpentering. The proceeds of the day's collection and new subscriptions amounted to over $100, making a very fine start. The tasteful edifice when finished will have already been paid in full. The Rev. Canon Jarvis is a splendid organizer, and strenuous efforts will be made to open it free of debt.

Weak Women

To weak and ailing women, there is at least one way to be cured that, even, two treatments, is established. One is local, one is constitutional; both are important, both essential. Only Nicki Cure is the Local.

Nicki Restorative, the Constitutional.

Nicki Cure—Dr. Shoop's Night Cure—is a topical and medicinal suppository remedy, while Dr. Shoop's Restorative is strictly an internal treatment. The Restorative reaches throughout the whole system, making the repair of all nerve, blood and tissue.

The Night Cure, as its name implies, does its work chiefly positively. It soothes sore and inflamed nervous surfaces, heals local weaknesses and discharges, while the Restorative, cases nervous exhaustion, gives enhanced vigor and ambition, builds up wasted tissue, brings about renewed strength, vigor, and energy. Take Dr. Shoop's Restorative—Tablet or Liquid—as a general tonic to the system. For positive local help, use as well

THE MASQUERADER

By Katherine Cecil Thurston, Author of "The Circle," Etc.

For a moment Loder remained motionless, then he rose suddenly, pushing back his chair.

"Tush, man! You don't know what you say. The fact of your being married bars it. Can't you see that?"

Again Chilcote caught his arm.

"You misunderstand," he said. "You misjudge the position. I tell you my wife and I are nothing to each other. She goes her way; I go mine. We have our own friends, our own rooms. Marriage, actual marriage, doesn't enter the question. We meet occasionally at meals and at other people's houses; sometimes we go out together for the sake of appearances; beyond that, nothing. If you take up my life nobody in it will trouble you less than Eve—I can promise that." He laughed unhappily.

Loder's face remained unmoved.

"Even granting that," he said, "the thing is still impossible."

"Why?"

"There is the house. The position there would be untenable. A man is known there as he is known in his own club." He drew away from Chilcote's touch.

"Very possibly. Very possibly." Chilcote laughed quickly and excitedly. "But what club is without its eccentric member? I am glad you spoke of that. I am glad you raised that point. It was a long time ago and I hit upon a reputation for moods as a shield for—for other things, and the more useful it has become the more I have let it grow. I tell you you might go down to the house tomorrow and spend the whole day without speaking to, even nodding to, a single man, and as long as you were I fo outward appearances no one would raise an eyebrow. In the same way you might vote in my place, ask a question, make a speech if you wanted to—"

At the word speech Loder turned involuntarily. For a fleeting second the confidence of his manner dropped and his face changed.

Chilcote, with his nervous quickness of perception, saw the hesitation, and a new look crossed his own face.

"Why not?" he said quickly. "You once had ambitions in that direction. Why not renew the ambitions?"

"And drop back from the mountains into the gutter?" Loder smiled and slowly shook his head.

"Better to live for one day than to exist for a hundred!" Chilcote's voice trembled with anxiety. For the third time he extended his hand and touched the other.

This time Loder did not shake off the detaining hand. He scarcely seemed to feel its pressure.

"Look here." Chilcote's fingers tightened. "A little while ago you talked of influence. Here you can step into a position built by influence. You might do all you once hoped to do"—

Loder suddenly lifted his head. "Absurd!" he said. "Absurd! Such a scheme was never carried through."

"Therefore why it will succeed. People never suspect until they have a precedent. Will you consider it? At least consider it. Remember, in the end is a risk it is I who am running it. On your own showing you have no possible responsibility."

The other laughed curtly.

"Before I go tonight will you promise me to consider it?"

"No."

"Then you will send me your decision by wire tomorrow. I won't take your answer now."

Loder freed his arm abruptly. "Why not?" he asked.

Chilcote smiled nervously. "Because I know men and men's temptations. We are all very strong till the quick is touched. Then we all wince. It's morphia with one man, ambitions with another. In each case it's only a matter of sooner or later." He laughed in his satirical, unstrung way and held out his hand. "You have my address," he said. "At seven"—

Loder pressed the hand proffered it. "Goodby," he said haltingly. Then he crossed the room quickly and threw the door open. "Goodby," he said again as the other passed him.

As he crossed the threshold Chilcote paused. "Au revoir," he corrected, with emphasis.

Until the last echo of his visitor's steps had died away Loder stood with his hand on the door. Then closing it quietly he turned and looked around the room. For a considerable space he stood there as if weighing the merits of each object. Then very slowly he moved to one of the bookshelves, drew out May's "Parliamentary Practice," and, carrying it to the desk, readjusted the lamp.

CHAPTER VI.

All the next day Chilcote moved in a fever of excitement. Hot with hope one moment, cold with fever the next, he rushed with restless energy into every task that presented itself, only to drop it as speedily. Twice during the morning he drove to the entrance of Clifford's Inn, but each time his courage failed him and he returned to Grosvenor square to learn that the expected message from Loder had not come.

It was a wearing condition of mind, but at worst it was scarcely more than an exaggeration of what his state had been for months and made but little obvious difference in his bearing or manner.

In the afternoon he took his place in the house, but, though it was his first appearance since his failure of two days ago, he drew but small personal notice. When he chose, his manner could repel advances with extreme effect, and of late men had been prone to draw away from him.

In one of the lobbies he encountered Fraide surrounded by a group of friends. With his usual furtive haste he would have passed on, but moving away from his party the old man accosted him. He was always courteously particular in his treatment of Chilcote, as the husband of his ward and goddaughter.

"Better, Chilcote," he said, holding out his hand. At the sound of the low, rather formal tone, so characteristic of the old statesman, a hundred memories rose to Chilcote's mind, a hundred hours distasteful in the living and unbearable in the recollection, and with them the new flash of hope, the new possibility of freedom. In a sudden rush of confidence he turned to his leader.

"I believe I've found a remedy for my nerves," he said. "I believe I'm going to be a new man." He laughed with a touch of excitement.

Fraide pressed his fingers kindly. "That is right," he said. "That is right. I called at Grosvenor square this morning, but Eve told me your illness of the other day was not serious. She was very busy this morning. She could only spare me a quarter of an hour. She is indefatigable over the social side of your prospects, Chilcote. You owe her a large debt. A popular wife means a great deal to a politician."

The steely eyes of his companion disturbed Chilcote.

He drew away his hand.

"Eve is unique," he said vaguely.

Fraide smiled. "That is right," he said again. "Admiration is too largely excluded from modern marriage." And with a courteous excuse he rejoined his friends.

It was dinner time before Chilcote could desert the house, but the moment departure was possible he hurried to Grosvenor square.

As he entered the house the hall was empty. He swore irritably under his breath and pressed the nearest bell. Since his momentary exultation in Fraide's presence his spirits had steadily fallen until now they hung at the lowest ebb.

As he waited in unconcealed impatience for an answer to his summons he caught sight of his man Allsopp at the head of the stairs.

"Come here!" he called, pleased to find some one upon whom to vent his irritation. "Has that wire come for me?"

"No, sir. I inquired five minutes back."

"Inquire again."

"Yes, sir." Allsopp disappeared.

A second later after his disappearance the bell of the hall door whirred loudly.

Chilcote started. All sudden sounds, like all strong lights, affected him. He half moved to the door, then stopped himself with a short exclamation. At the same instant Allsopp reappeared.

Chilcote turned on him excitedly.

"What the devil's the meaning of this?" he said. "A battery of servants in the house and nobody to open the hall door!"

Allsopp looked embarrassed. "Crupham is coming directly, sir. He only left the hall to ask Jeffries"—

Chilcote turned. "Confound Crupham!" he exclaimed. "Go and open the door yourself."

Allsopp hesitated, his dignity struggling with his obedience. As he waited the bell sounded again.

"Did you hear me?" Chilcote said.

"Yes, sir." Allsopp crossed the hall.

As the door was opened Chilcote passed his handkerchief from one hand to the other in the fresh dew of hope and fear, then as the sound of his own name in the shrill tones of a telegraph boy reached his ears he let the handkerchief drop to the ground.

Allsopp took the yellow envelope and carried it to his master.

"A telegram, sir," he said. "And the boy wishes to know if there is an answer." Picking up Chilcote's handkerchief, he turned aside with elaborate dignity.

Chilcote's hands were so unsteady that he could scarcely insert his finger under the flap of the envelope. Tearing off a corner, he pushed the covering apart and smoothed out the flimsy pink paper.

The message was very simple, consisting of but seven words:

Shall expect you at 11 tonight.

LODER.

He read it two or three times, then he looked up. "No answer," he said mechanically, and to his own ears his relief in his voice sounded harsh and unnatural.

Exactly as the clocks chimed 11 Chilcote mounted the stairs to Loder's rooms. But this time there was more of haste than of uncertainty in his steps, and, reaching the landing, he crossed it in a couple of strides and knocked feverishly on the door.

It opened at once, and Loder stood before him.

The occasion was peculiar. For a moment neither spoke; each involuntarily looked at the other with new eyes and under changed conditions. Each had assumed a fresh standpoint in the other's thought. The passing astonishment, the half irrational curiosity that had previously tinged their relationship, was cast aside, never to be reassumed. In each the other saw himself—and something more.

As usual, Loder was the first to recover himself.

"I was expecting you," he said. "Won't you come in?"

The words were almost the same as his word of the night before, but his voice had a different ring, just as his face when he drew back into the room had a different expression—a suggestion of decision and energy that had been lacking before. Chilcote caught the difference as he crossed the threshold, and for a bare second a flicker of something like jealousy touched him, but the sensation was fleeting.

"I have to thank you," he said, holding out his hand. He was too well bred to show by a hint that he understood the drop in the other's principles, but Loder broke down the artifice.

"Let's be straight with each other, since everybody else has to be deceived," he said, taking the other's hand. "You have nothing to thank me for, and you know it. It's a touch of the old Adam. You tempted me, and I fell." He laughed, but below the laugh ran a note of something like triumph—the curious triumph of a man who has known the tyranny of strength and suddenly appreciates the freedom of a weakness.

"You fully realize the thing you have proposed?" he added in a different tone. "It's not too late to retract even now."

Chilcote opened his lips, paused, then laughed in imitation of his companion, but the laugh sounded forced.

"My dear fellow," he said at last, "I never retract."

"Never?"

"No."

"Then the bargain's sealed."

Loder walked slowly across the room and, taking up his position by the mantelpiece, looked at his companion. The similarity between them as they faced each other seemed abnormal, defying even the closest scrutiny. And yet, no mysterious is nature even in her lapses, they were subtly, indefinably different. Chilcote was Loder deprived of one essential; Loder, Chilcote with that essential bestowed. The difference lay neither in feature, in coloring or in height, but in that baffling, illusive inner illumination that some call individuality and others soul.

Something of this idea, misted and tangled by nervous imagination, crossed Chilcote's mind in that moment of scrutiny, but he shrank from it apprehensively.

"I—I came to discuss details," he said quickly, crossing the space that divided him from his host. "Shall we!— Are you?"— He paused uneasily.

"I'm entirely in your hands." Loder spoke with abrupt decision. Moving to the table, he indicated a chair and drew another forward for himself.

Both sat down.

Chilcote leaned forward, resting elbows on the table. "There will be several things to consider," he began nervously, looking across at the other.

"Quite so." Loder glanced back appreciatively. "I thought about those things the better part of last night. To begin with, I must study your handwriting. I guarantee to get it right, but it will take a month."

"A month?"

"Well, perhaps three weeks. We mustn't make a mess of things."

Chilcote shifted his position.

"Three weeks!" he repeated. "Couldn't you?—"

"No, I couldn't." Loder spoke authoritatively. "I might never want to put pen to paper; but, on the other hand, I might have to sign a check one day." He laughed. "Have you ever thought of that—that I might have to, or want to, sign a check?"

"No. I confess that escaped me."

"You risk your fortune that you may keep the place it bought for you?" Loder laughed again. "How do you know that I am not a blackguard?" he added. "How do you know that I won't clear out one day and leave you high and dry? What to prevent John Chilcote from realizing £40,000 or £50,000 and then making himself scarce?"

"You won't do that," Chilcote said, with unusual decision. "I told you your weakness last night, and it wasn't money. Money isn't the rock you'll split over."

"Then you think I'll split upon some rock? But that's beyond the question. To get to business again. You'll risk my studying your signature?"

Chilcote nodded.

"Right! Now item two." Loder counted on his fingers. "I must know the names and faces of your men friends as far as I can. Your woman friends don't count. While I'm you, you will be adamant." He laughed again pleasantly. "But the men are essential—the backbone of the whole business."

"I have no men friends. I don't trust the idea of friendship."

"Acquaintances, then."

Chilcote looked up sharply. "I think we score there," he said. "I have a reputation for absentmindedness that will carry you anywhere. They tell me I can look through the most substantial man in the house and, if he were not a saner, though I may have lunched with him the same day."

Loder smiled. "By Jove!" he exclaimed. "Fate must have been contriving this before either of us were born. It dovetails ridiculously. But I must know your colleagues, even if it's only to cut them. You'll have to take me to the house."

"Impossible!"

"Not at all!" Again the tone of authority fell to Loder. "I can pull my hat over my eyes and turn up my coat collar. Nobody will notice me. We can choose the fall of the afternoon. I promise you 'twill be all right."

"Suppose the likeness should leak out! It's a risk."

Loder laughed confidently. "Tush, man! Risk is the salt of life. I must see you at your post, and I must see the men you work with." He rose, walked across the room and took his pipe from the rack. "When I go in for a thing I like to go in over head"

Mark Twain recently told this story as an illustration of the difficulty of making what he dined with Ex-Kaiser Bill. "He reproached by saying, 'Bill, we think a shame that you have not spoken a word to Uncle Joe.' 'Why, Mark,' he said, 'how do you explain it? How do you justify it?' 'I'm sure,' said I, 'I didn't want to interrupt her.'"

Who Gets the Most Out of Life?

Not the wealthiest, not the most learned, nor the idler—but the man who has good health and works for his living. This truth is trite, but not trivial.

Every man should guard his health as his most valuable possession. The more so because health is easier to retain than regain.

Keep your grip on health by regular exercise, reasonable care in eating and requisite sleep. Take Beecham's Pills occasionally to tone the stomach and keep the liver and bowels in good working order. And don't worry.

Observe these simple rules and you will agree that the one who gets the most from life is

NOW FOR ANOTHER

Hosiery Week

May 2d to May 11th.

One year ago we held a successful hosiery week. So much so that results were quoted very favorably of it in New York trade publications. This year our "hosiery week" will start Thursday, May 2d, and continue to May 11th. During the week the interior display will strongly feature hosiery. Our purchases of hosiery for the season were very extensive and in this way we will be making it easy, for the entire community, to become familiar with our hosiery values. We start the ball rolling with a Special Sale of Ribbed Cotton Hosiery, Thursday, May 2d, 19 cents or 3 Pairs for 50 cents.

These sale ribbed hose are a well known make, that we are not permitted to use the name of at cut prices. They come in to us as seconds, some have slight imperfections. You will recognize the stocking as one you have paid 25 cents for. You therefore get 3 pair for price of two. At commencement of sale we have all sizes, 6 in. to 10 inches. Ready Thursday morning, May 2d, at 8 o'clock and continue through Hosiery Week until all sold. More particulars of Hosiery Week in next Beaver.

Philosophy of Boys' Clothing.

Thomas Carlyle, speaking of clothing, says the cut betokens the intellect and talent, the color betokens the heart and temper. The success of Robinson Clothing for boys comes from a recognition of the 'Philosophy of Clothes.' We sell a suit to fit the boy—we intend it to be as much a part of him as his skin—that is, to fit otherwise than physically. As, for instance, we would not fit a red boy with a pink suit. We want the boy and clothes to fit each other. If we haven't made this plain, bring your boy and we'll show you.

Single and Double Breasted Boys' Suits with knee trousers, plain and fancy effects, 3 pieces, $3.00 to $8.50.

Boys' two piece Suits and Norfolks, $2.00 to $6.00.

—Wm. Crippen was arrested last Friday, charged with an inhuman crime against his daughter. His wife was also charged with abetting him. They have since been confined in the county jail, and His Honor Judge Madden will try the case at the Court House next Monday. Since their arrest, Chief Graham has had charge of the six Crippen children, ranging from two to twelve years old. They were in a filthy condition, but were all given a bath and supplied with new clothing by the ladies of the town.

—After reading Mr. Manly Jones' letter in last week's Beaver, some people were under the impression that our local member declined to accompany the deputation to interview the government. Mr. Carscallen wishes us to state that Mr. Jones did not ask him to go with them or even hint at such a thing, as he would have been only too glad to present them. During the past year he has presented a large number of petitions respecting the new school law, the sentiments of many of which he did not approve of, and he would gladly have accompanied Mr. Jones or anyone else from this constituency who wished to interview the ministers.

—The steam barge Water Lily brought a cargo of coal yesterday for Mr. F. E. VanLoven.

—Chief Graham removed an old citizen to Kockwood Hospital, Kingston, on Wednesday.

—The Brisco House Cafe has been further improved by the addition of ladies' sitting room down stairs.

—A successor has not yet been appointed to succeed the late J. R. Fraser on the Entrance Board.

—The schooner Winnie Wing arrived in the harbor on Wednesday with a load of coal for the Rathbun Co., the first of the season.

—Mr. W. A. Rockwell will be in town for a couple of weeks, tuning pianos. Orders may be left at his house on John st., Napanee.

—We were this week shown four monster eggs laid by Mr. John W. Walker's hens at Strathcona. The largest measures 8x7½ inches, and the others are about as large.

—The regular monthly meeting of the W.C.T.U. will be held in the board room of the Public Library, Tuesday, April 30th, at 3 o'clock. L. Anderson, Rec. Sec.

—Mr. Albert Hayfelt is planting an orchard of 200 Baldwin apple trees on his Bayside farm. He is also interested in a farm near Victor, N.Y., but hopes to reside on Bay of Quinte.

—Mr. Benj. Lutlefield, proprietor of the Briscc House, dropped by express on Monday his handsome pair of Great Dane pups, to a Mr. Grisdale, Lima, Ohio. He got $50 for them.

—Dick Richardson, working on a hand saw in the Gilbard factory, last Saturday had the little finger of his right hand cut off. The second and third fingers were also badly lacerated.

—The unfarmed coal in ashes will burn without salt or water if spread thinly over good coal. The new plan of watering and salting the ashes may make a bigger fire but the damage to furnace and pipes will be great. Oxalic acid and salt crate fierce rust. The new scheme wastes money.

—Mr. H. B. Sherwood has a large gang of men employed, excavating for his new summer residence on his grounds at Sydenham, lately purchased from J. A. Gwin. The cottage will be a large, two-story stone structure, equipped with modern conveniences, and having large verandahs projecting over the lake, rendering a fine view both up and down the lake, and will also be very convenient to the village. The building stone is being brought from Deseronto.

Fred. L. Hooper,

—Mrs. A. F. Hamilton died at her home in Toronto on Thursday morning, 25th inst., after an illness of four weeks of a low fever. The remains were brought to Napanee last night on the 6.40 train. Deceased was the youngest daughter of Mrs. Geo. Davy, who died 11th last, and besides her bereaved husband, leaves two sisters, Mrs. Canfield Shorey and Miss Lena Davy, Napanee, and a brother, Mr. Harry Davy, Vancouver, B.C. Mrs. Hamilton had a quiet unassuming woman, devoted to her husband and mother and sisters, by whom she was idolized. The many friends will extend their sincerest sympathy to the bereaved husband and friends.

—On the 7th inst., Frank Rodgers, who owns a farm a few miles east of Denbigh, met with a serious misfortune. About eleven o'clock in the morning he discovered the roof of his frame dwelling house to be on fire. A high wind was blowing at the time and the flames, when noticed had already spread over a large part of the roof and set the upper rooms on fire, so that no attempts could be made to save the building, and only a very small part of the contents of the house could yet be got out. Although the barn, a good frame building, was at a considerable distance from the house, the roof of it also caught fire from flying embers and was destroyed with all contents and the stables attached. As the loss includes all his grain, provisions and feed of all kinds, and Mr. Rodgers carried no insurance on either buildings or contents, it is a very serious one.

—Mr. R. E. Scott, Newburgh Road, met with quite a loss on Monday last, when his sap-house together with contents was burned. Owing to the furious wind that was blowing, it was hard to keep the fire from spreading throughout the woods, but with the kind assistance rendered by the neighbors it was kept quite well under control.

—Mr. a. Wm. Thomsit, Napanee, and Mr. Frank Thomson, Montreal, wish to thank the friends at Morven for their kindness and especially to Messrs. John and Geo. ODESSA.

While the three children of Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Clark were playing last Sunday afternoon, the youngest boy, Clarence, three years old, ran behind Watts & Jones' factory and fell into a well, seventeen feet deep. The well was nearly full of water and the little lad clung to a board. Carl Clark, hearing his cry, ran and reached down and got hold of him. Carl is only seven years old, but he called for his sister Eva who is only five years old, for help of the two they got the little boy out. When they got him home he was in a bad condition, but is improving nicely. Carl saved his sister Eva one year ago from drowning at the mill pond. She fell in when the stream was full current. The well spoken of is a dangerous place and Mr. Jones has been told to close it up, but why he refuses to do so we can't understand.

UNION IS STRENGTH

LESSONS GATHERED FROM THE TINY, BUT POWERFUL LOCUSTS.

God's Mercy and Goodness Displayed In Creation—Value of An Observant Eye—How Locusts Work—Plea For Christian Unity—Sectarianism Must Be Eliminated If Christ's Kingdom Is to Prosper.

Entered according to Act of Parliament of Canada, in the year 1907, by Frederick Dyer, Toronto, at the Dept. of Agriculture, Ottawa.

Los Angeles, Cal., April 21.—With the opening spring the preacher returns to the book of nature and finds a gospel lesson in the wonders of the awakening insect world. The text is Proverbs xxx. 27, "The locusts have no king, yet go they forth all of them by bands."

The more I study the Bible in connection with the span of revelation which science has given to us in the natural world the more wonderful and marvelous the omnipotence and omnipresence of God appear to me. There are some people who never study the goodness and mercy of God outside of the leaves of the holy book. When you begin to talk to them about the wonders of God in nature, they reply, "Why don't you preach the old gospel instead of talking about tadpoles and snakes and bugs and beasts and such stuff?" The reason I talk so much about nature, my friend, is because I find the character of God revealed there as in the gospel preached there, and I am sustained by the example of the Bible itself, which is full of such sermonic themes. I have also the authority of the wisest of men, who bids us watch the conies building their houses in the rocks, and the ants providing food for the winter's storm, and the spider swinging her silken hammocks in the king's palaces. Even the locust's marching forth to their conquests in great bands.

It is amazing how much our love and reverence for God will grow if we only study closely the marvelous conformations and habits of the lowest and most despised of his creatures. If we do not see God in the natural world, then it is because we have eyes that are blind, and for about time we scattered the darkness of ignorance by letting in the light of investigation and study. When a new student entered one of Prof. Agassiz's classes, the great teacher of natural science would place before him the skeleton of an ordinary fish like the black bass. "Study that," would be his brief command, "and then come and tell me what you see." The student would tell me what you see." The student in amazement would sit down and look at these dried bones of a little while, and then he would go to the professor's desk and say: "Why, teacher, I see the sides of a fish. That is all." Then the professor would show him how the fish's backbone is joined together by one big backbone, like the skeleton of man; how the fish's tail and fins are used by the fish as man's hands and feet are used when he swims; how the fish has a series of spines, above and beneath it to keep it in a perpendicular position, as it can cut its way through the water. The professor would point out that the head of the fish is made of strong bony substance, like the iron prow of a boat, where the strength of the fish must be very great. Thus the new student learned how the bones were fitted together and how the jaws were set for catching the prey. After he had spoken thus for a long time Prof. Agassiz would say: "My son, never say again that a bone is simply a bone. When you study a bone, you must notice how it joins with other bones and learn what is the purpose of that bone. Now you are ready to begin your scientific studies in one of my students." Thus, in my text, Solomon bids us study the locust, that marvelous little insect whose ravages are the dread of the farmer. He would have us observe how it is constructed, how it is adapted for the work it has to do and how it co-operates with its fellows, like a soldier in an army. This opening spring season is an appropriate time for following Solomon's advice and considering "the locusts, who have no king, but who go forth in bands."

In the first place, when I began to study the little creature of my text I was surprised to find out what an insignificant insect it was individually. Few people to have given it the means of self protection. It has no spear with which to stab like the hornet, no sting like the bee, no cruel beak like the hawk, no deadly claw like the tiger, no deadly poison like the tarantula or the snake, no vise-like jaw, as has the alligator, and no powerful wing like the wing of the albatross. It is so helpless as an individual that the smallest kinds of insects can attack it with impunity. It is the prey of innumerable destroyers. Wherever the swarms of locusts are there fly great flocks of greedy birds feeding upon them. When the locusts are in the egg in our northern state, they are destroyed by the millions, yet these seemingly helpless insects have been the most feared of all the insects of the world. No plague of Egypt struck more terror to the hand and heart of Pharaoh and his subjects than this plague of clawless, beakless, poisonless, stingless insects, but when this thought dawned upon me I said, "Is it not a fact that the nations and the women in this world who have accomplished most for God have carried no antlers, whose jaws concealed no poisonous fang, whose tongue never gave a rapier thrust and whose hand was never the murderous claw of the wild beast?"

But there is another fact to which I want to draw your attention in reference to these insignificant insects. They are insignificant as to the strength of their bodies. It seems as though the span of their life is a breath. Hardly are they hatched and their wings grown than, like a moth flying about in a candle light, their lives seem to be snuffed out in a day, and yet the brevity of the insect's life does not strike us as startling, for I find that some of the greatest men have been the shortest lived men.

Soon after Percy Bysshe Shelley was cast in the Bay of Spezia his widow, Mary Shelley, wrote these beautiful words: "Shelley, my beloved, this year has a new name from any thou hast known. Thou art a spirit, and that you never saw will shadow the ground, and flowers you never beheld itself, which is full of such sermonic themes. I have also the authority of the wisest of men, who bids us watch the conies building their houses in the rocks, and the ants providing food for the winter's storm, and the spider swinging her silken hammocks in the king's palaces. Even the locust's marching forth to their conquests in great bands.

It is amazing how much our love and reverence for God will grow if we only study closely the marvelous conformations and habits of the lowest and most despised of his creatures. If we do not see God in the natural world, then it is because we have eyes that are blind, and for about time we scattered the darkness of ignorance by letting in the light of investigation and study. When a new student entered one of Prof. Agassiz's classes, the great teacher of natural science would place before him the skeleton of an ordinary fish like the black bass. "Study that," would be his brief command, "and then come and tell me what you see." The student would tell me what you see." The student in amazement would sit down and look at these dried bones of a little while, and then he would go to the professor's desk and say: "Why, teacher, I see the sides of a fish. That is all." Then the professor would show him how the fish's backbone is joined together by one big backbone, like the skeleton of man; how the fish's tail and fins are used by the fish as man's hands and feet are used when he swims; how the fish has a series of spines, above and beneath it to keep it in a perpendicular position, as it can cut its way through the water. The professor would point out that the head of the fish is made of strong bony substance, like the iron prow of a boat, where the strength of the fish must be very great. Thus the new student learned how the bones were fitted together and how the jaws were set for catching the prey. After he had spoken thus for a long time Prof. Agassiz would say: "My son, never say again that a bone is simply a bone. When you study a bone, you must notice how it joins with other bones and learn what is the purpose of that bone. Now you are ready to begin your scientific studies in one of my students." Thus, in my text, Solomon bids us study the locust, that marvelous little insect whose ravages are the dread of the farmer. He would have us observe how it is constructed, how it is adapted for the work it has to do and how it co-operates with its fellows, like a soldier in an army. This opening spring season is an appropriate time for following Solomon's advice and considering "the locusts, who have no king, but who go forth in bands."

In the first place, when I began to study the little creature of my text I was surprised to find out what an insignificant insect it was individually. Few people to have given it the means of self protection. It has no spear with which to stab like the hornet, no sting like the bee, no cruel beak like the hawk, no deadly claw like the tiger, no deadly poison like the tarantula or the snake, no vise-like jaw, as has the alligator, and no powerful wing like the wing of the albatross. It is so helpless as an individual that the smallest kinds of insects can attack it with impunity. It is the prey of innumerable destroyers. Wherever the swarms of locusts are there fly great flocks of greedy birds feeding upon them. When the locusts are in the egg in our northern state, they are destroyed by the millions, yet these seemingly helpless insects have been the most feared of all the insects of the world. No plague of Egypt struck more terror to the hand and heart of Pharaoh and his subjects than this plague of clawless, beakless, poisonless, stingless locusts, but when this thought dawned upon me I said, "Is it not a fact that the nations and the women in this world who have accomplished most for God have carried no antlers, whose jaws concealed no poisonous fang, whose tongue never gave a rapier thrust and whose hand was never the murderous claw of the wild beast?"

But there is another fact to which I want to draw your attention in reference to these insignificant insects. They are insignificant as to the strength of their bodies. It seems as though the span of their life is a breath. Hardly are they hatched and their wings grown than, like a moth flying about in a candle light, their lives seem to be snuffed out in a day, and yet the brevity of the insect's life does not strike us as startling, for I find that some of the greatest men have been the shortest lived men.

Everybody Agrees

that COD LIVER OIL and IRON are beyond question the greatest medicines known. Then why does not everybody take Cod Liver Oil and Iron? Simply because, most people cannot take the Oil and few can digest the Iron in any ordinary form. These difficulties have been entirely removed by the introduction of FERROL, in which the Iron is scientifically combined with the Oil, rendering the Oil palatable and the Iron digestible. While is manufactured from the best quality of Cod Liver Oil (the whole of the Oil) and is richer in oil than any other emulsion, and while it contains just the right quantity of the best form of Iron and Phosphorus, it is so scientifically combined that not one person in a thousand finds any trouble in taking it, digests it without difficulty, and receives the well-established value of the Oil and Iron in immediate enhancement. Try it, and mark the improvement in your health.

"I am so glad you gave me Ferrol," writes Mrs. Greatrex, "for it has done me so much good. I was all run down, and could not sleep or eat. Ferrol has built me up, and I am now quite well and strong."

WEDDING AT WATERLOO.

The marriage of Miss Agnes Georgina Moore, younger daughter of Mr. George Moore, Waterloo, to Mr. W. M. O. Lochead, M.A., Berlin, was celebrated yesterday afternoon, at the home of the bride's father, Union st. The ceremony, which was performed at 4 p.m. by the Rev. W. D. Lee, Waterloo, was witnessed by only the immediate relatives and a few intimate friends of the respective families. The bride, who was unattended, was given away by her father and was gowned in white silk crepe de chine and carried a shower bouquet of lilies of the valley. The wedding march was played by Mrs. Will McLean, of Seaforth. After receiving the congratulations and best wishes of all present and partaking of the wedding dejeuner, the bride and groom left on the evening train for Toronto and eastern points. The going away gown was of brown broadcloth with hat to match.

SUDDEN DEATH.

Death came suddenly to Henry J. Abbett, Kingsford, on Wednesday. He was cultivating a field and a young friend of his took after a neighbor's sheep. He chased the dog for a distance, and after getting it, got into the buggy of a neighbor who was driving along the road. After going but a short distance, Mr. Abbett fell out of the buggy, and when picked up life was extinct. The over exertion caused the dog probably was the cause of his death, as he had a weak heart. He was aged fifty-three years and eight months. Deceased was well known and highly respected. He leaves a wife and two daughters, Miss Lily, at home, and Mrs. Herbert Kimmerly, Lonsdale; also two half-sisters, Mrs. George Richmond, Owenby, and Mrs. Hiram Stafford, Twomblings. The funeral service will be held at Empey Hill church this afternoon at 2 o'clock.

KILLORAN—McMULLEN.

A very pretty but quiet wedding was solemnized at seven o'clock Monday morning, April 22nd, in the R. C. Church, Erinsville, when Miss M. Agnes Killoran, second daughter of Mr. Thos. Killoran, was united in marriage to Mr. P. McMullen, of Montreal. Rev. Father Carey performed the ceremony. The bride, who was given away by her father, was handsomely gowned in cream voile de nice and very pretty white picture hat with plume, and carried a white prayer book. Mrs. J. A. Killoran was matron of honor and looked well in a dress of point d'esprit over pale green crepe, and white leghorn hat trimmed with plumes. J. A. Killoran supported the groom. Mendelssohn's wedding march was played by the bride's sister, Miss Lena, who also played during the mass. After the ceremony the wedding party were driven by Mr. Diamond's cab, which was appropriately decorated for the occasion with white ribbons, to the home of the bride's parents where a recherche wedding breakfast was served, the tables being prettily decorated. Under a shower of rice the happy couple left on the 10 o'clock train, followed by the best wishes of a host of friends, for a short honeymoon trip, after which they will take up their residence in Montreal. The bride's going-away costume was of light grey panama cloth trimmed with persian braid and becoming hat to match. Miss Killoran is one of our most popular young ladies and will be greatly missed.

The Day-light Store

Greater Napanee's Popular Trading Place.

Now that we feel assured that warmer weather will stay with us, this store is going to play the largest part in the commercial side of the summer season that it has ever played—and that's saying something. The details of our plans would make a fine subject for the ordinary form of "heart to heart talks with our public," but we resist the temptation to write one because we don't believe very much in them when they concern mere store arrangements. They interest us immensely, but we think you probably care more for results than methods. The host who provides you with a perfect dinner doesn't preface it with an account of his interviews with cook, butcher and florist. She or he won't say anything about what we are doing and planning. We ask you to come in when you are ready and enjoy what we have done. Are you sure you know this big, busy, popular store as it deserves to be known? If you have not visited us lately you are likely to find some pleasant surprises and get a new viewpoint. You may find some significance in this one fact—freely admitted by the entire retail community—that this business is one of the most progressive in the country, and is at present enjoying the fastest and most solid growth of its entire history.

and ears," he added as he opened his tobacco jar.

His pipe filled, he resumed his seat, leaning his elbows on the table in unconscious imitation of Chilcote's—"not a match?" he said inconlicately, holding out his hand.

In response Chilcote drew his match box from his pocket and struck a light. As their hands touched an exclamation escaped him.

"By Jove!" he said, with a fretful mixture of disappointment and surprise. "I hadn't noticed that!" His eyes were fixed in annoyed interest on Loder's extended hand.

Loder, following his glance, smiled. "Odd that we should both have overlooked it! It clean escaped my mind. It's rather an ugly scar." He lifted his hand till the light fell more fully on it. Above the second joint of the right finger ran a jagged furrow, the memento of a wound that had once laid bare the bone.

Chilcote leaned forward. "How did you come by it?" he asked.

The other shrugged his shoulders with a laugh. "Ancient history."

The results are present day enough. "Very awkward, very annoying!"

Loder, still looking at his hand, didn't seem to hear. "There's only one thing to be done," he said. "Each wear two rings on the third finger of the left hand. Two rings ought to cover it." He made a speculative measurement with the point of his thumb.

Chilcote looked irritable and disturbed. "I detest rings. I never wear them."

Loder raised his eyes calmly. "Neither do I," he said, "but there's no reason for bigotry."

But Chilcote's irritability was startled. He pushed back his chair. "I don't like the idea," he said.

The other rose him unusually. "What never beggar you are!" he said. "You prefer the danger of a man signing checks and slip at wearing a piece of jewelry. I'll have a fair share of industry to study."

Chilcote moved restlessly. "Everybody knows I detest jewelry."

Everybody knows you are capricious. It's not for me the rings or nothing at all I make out."

Chilcote again altered his position, with a shrug of irritation. At last, after a struggle with himself, he looked up.

"I suppose you're right!" he said, with a poor show of his own way." It was the small, tangible concession to the other's will.

Loder took his victory quietly. "Then it's all straight now?"

"As far as the matter of the—the ring goes," Chilcote hazarded the opportunity.

There was a faint pause then Loder repeated quietly, "My pay?"

Chilcote was embarrassed. "I didn't quite like to put it that way."

"But that was what you thought, you were honest—even with yourself."

Chilcote drew his chair closer to the table, but he did not attend to the other's words. His fingers strayed to his breast pocket and fumbled there. Then he drew the gesture. "Look here," he said, "you are overtaxing yourself. I think of the pay can't possibly matter to you. I shall have to shelve it to another night. You need rest."

Loder lifted his eyes with a recognition. "Thanks. I do feel a little jaded. If I may, I'll have that cigar."

Chilcote turned. "Why, in the devil's name"— he began; then again he halted. Something in Chilcote's drawn, excited face checked him. The strange sense of predestination that we sometimes see in the eyes of another struck him for a time, chilling his last attempt at remonstrance. "What do you want me to do?" he substituted in an ordinary voice.

The words steadied Chilcote. He laughed a little. The laugh was still shaky, but it was pitched in a lower key.

"You—you're quite right to pull me up. We have no time to waste. It must be 1 o'clock." He pulled out his watch, then walked to the window and stood looking down into the shadowy court. "How quiet you are here!" he said. Then abruptly a new thought struck him, and he wheeled back into the room. "Loder," he said quickly—"Loder, I have an idea! While you are no, why shouldn't I be you? Why shouldn't I be John Loder instead of the vagrant we contemplated? It covers everything; it explains everything. It's magnificent! I'm amazed we never thought of it before."

Loder was still beside the desk. "I thought of it," he said without looking back.

"And didn't suggest it?"

"No."

"Why?"

Loder said nothing, and the other shrieked.

"Jealous of your reputation?" he said satirically.

"I have none to be jealous of."

Chilcote laughed disagreeably. "Then you aren't so far gone in philosophy as I thought. You have a niche in your own good opinion."

Again Loder was silent; then he smiled. "You have an oddly correct perception at times," he said, "but I suppose I have had a lame sort of pride in keeping my name clean, but pride like that is the affectation, and I'm ready to float with the tide." He laughed a short laugh that Chilcote had heard once or twice before, and, crossing the room, he stood beside his visitor. "After all," he said, "what business have I with pride, straight or lame? Have my identity, if you want it. When all defenses have been broken down one barrier won't save the town." Laughing again, he laid his hand on the other's arm. "Come," he said, "give your orders. I capitulate."

An hour later the two men passed from Loder's bedroom, where the final arrangements had been completed, back into the sitting room. Loder came first in faultless evening dress. His hair was carefully brushed, the clothes he wore fitted him perfectly. His head was bent and his hand moved tactfully as he traced line after line of meaningless words on a sheet of foolscap. Having covered the page with writing, he rose, moved to the center table and compared his last with an open letter that lay there. The comparison seemed to please him. He straightened his shoulders and threw back his head in an attitude of critical satisfaction. So absorbed was he that when a step sounded on the stairs outside he did not notice it, and only raised his head when the door was thrown open unceremoniously. Even then his interest was momentary.

"Hello!" he said, his eyes returning to their scrutiny of his task.

Chilcote shut the door and came hastily across the room. He looked ill and harassed. As he reached Loder he put out his hand nervously and touched his arm.

Loder looked up. "What is it?" he asked. "Any new development?"

Chilcote tried to smile. "Yes," he said huskily. "It's come."

Loder freed his arm. "What? The end of the world?"

"No. The end of me." The words came jerkily, the strain that had enforced them showing in every syllable.

Still Loder was unconcerned. He could not or would not understand. Again Chilcote caught and jerked at his sleeve. "Don't you see? Can't you see?"

"No."

Chilcote dropped the sleeve and passed his handkerchief across his forehead. "It's come," he repeated. "Don't you understand? I want you." He drew away, then stopped back again hastily. "I know what you're taking on unaware," he said. "But it's not my fault. On my soul, it's not! The thing sprung on me—sprung at me—got me"—He stopped, shaking weakly into a chair.

For a moment Loder stood erect and immovable. Then, almost with reluctance, his glance turned to the figure by the door.

"You want me to take your place tonight, without preparation?" His voice was distinct and firm, but it was free from contempt.

"Yes; yes, I do." Chilcote spoke without looking up.

"That you may spend the night in monphia—this and other nights?"

Chilcote lifted a flushed, unsettled face. "You have no right to preach. You accepted the bargain."

Loder raised his head quickly. "I never"— he began. Then both his face and voice altered. "You are quite right," he said coldly. "You won't have to complain again."

Chilcote stirred uncomfortably. "My dear fellow," he said, "I meant no offense. It's merely"—

"Your nerves. I know. But come to business. What am I to do?"

Chilcote rose excitedly. "Yes, business. Let's come to business. It's rough on you, taking you short like this. But you have an erratic person to deal with. I've had a horrible day—a horrible day. His face had paled again, and in the green lamplight it possessed a grayish hue. Involuntarily Loder looked away.

Chilcote watched him as he passed to the desk and began mechanically counting packets. "A hundred," he repeated, "so bad that I daren't face the night. You have read De Quincey? he asked, with a sudden change of tone.

"Yes."

"Then read him again and you'll understand. I have all the horrors without the drug. I am no 'ladies of sorrow,' but I have worse companions than his 'crocodile.'" He laughed unpleasantly.

Loder turned. "Why, in the devil's name"— he began; then again he halted. Something in Chilcote's drawn, excited face checked him. It was the strange sense of predestination that we sometimes see in the eyes of another struck him for a time, chilling his last attempt at remonstrance. "What do you want me to do?" he substituted in an ordinary voice.

The words steadied Chilcote. He laughed a little. The laugh was still shaky, but it was pitched in a lower key.

"You—you're quite right to pull me up. We have no time to waste. It must be 1 o'clock." He pulled out his watch, then walked to the window and stood looking down into the shadowy court. "How quiet you are here!" he said. Then abruptly a new thought struck him, and he wheeled back into the room. "Loder," he said quickly—"Loder, I have an idea! While you are no, why shouldn't I be you? Why shouldn't I be John Loder instead of the vagrant we contemplated? It covers everything; it explains everything. It's magnificent! I'm amazed we never thought of it before."

Loder was still beside the desk. "I thought of it," he said without looking back.

"And didn't suggest it?"

"No."

"Why?"

Loder said nothing, and the other shrieked.

"Jealous of your reputation?" he said satirically.

"I have none to be jealous of."

Chilcote laughed disagreeably. "Then you aren't so far gone in philosophy as I thought. You have a niche in your own good opinion."

Again Loder was silent; then he smiled. "You have an oddly correct perception at times," he said, "but I suppose I have had a lame sort of pride in keeping my name clean, but pride like that is the affectation, and I'm ready to float with the tide." He laughed a short laugh that Chilcote had heard once or twice before, and, crossing the room, he stood beside his visitor. "After all," he said, "what business have I with pride, straight or lame? Have my identity, if you want it. When all defenses have been broken down one barrier won't save the town." Laughing again, he laid his hand on the other's arm. "Come," he said, "give your orders. I capitulate."

An hour later the two men passed from Loder's bedroom, where the final arrangements had been completed, back into the sitting room. Loder came first in faultless evening dress. His hair was carefully brushed, the clothes he wore fitted him perfectly. To any glance, critical or casual, he was the man who had remained in the study and entered the rooms earlier in the evening. Chilcote's manner of walking and poise of the head seemed to have descended upon him with Chilcote's clothes. He came into the room hastily and went to the desk.

"I have no private papers," he said, "so I have nothing to lock up. Everything can remain as it is. A woman named Robins comes in the mornings to clean up and light the fire; otherwise you must shift for yourself. Nobody will disturb you. Quiet, dead quiet, is about the one thing you can count on."

Chilcote, half halting in the doorway, made an attempt to laugh. Of the two he was noticeably the more embarrassed. In Loder's well worn, well brushed tweed suit he felt stranded on his own personality, bereft for the moment of the familiar accessories that helped to cloak deficiencies and keep the wheel of conventionality comfortably rolling. He stood unpleasantly conscious of himself, unable to shape his sensations even in thought. He glanced at the fire, at the table, finally at the chair on which he had thrown his overcoat before entering the bedroom. At the sight of the coat his gaze brightened, the aimlessness broke him, and he gave an exclamation of relief.

"By Jove!" he said. "I clean forgot."

"What?" Loder looked round.

"The rings." He crossed to the coat and thrust his hand into the pocket. "The duplicates arrived only this afternoon—the nick of time, eh?" He spoke fast, his fingers searching hastily. Occupation of any kind came as a boon.

Loder slowly followed him, and as the box was brought to light he leaned forward interestedly.

"As I told you, one is the copy of an old signet ring, the other a plain band —a plain gold band like a wedding ring." Chilcote laughed as he placed the four rings side by side on his palm. "I could think of nothing else that would be wide and not ostentatious. You know how I detest display."

Loder touched the rings. "You have good taste," he said. "Let's see if they serve their purpose." He picked them up and carried them to the lamp.

Chilcote followed him. "Just as an ugly wound," he said, his curiosity reawakening as Loder extended his finger. "How did you come by it?"

The other smiled. "It's a memento," he said.

"Of bravery?"

"No; quite the reverse." He looked again at his hand, then glanced back at Chilcote. "No," he repeated, with an unusual impulse of confidence. "It serves to remind me that I am not exempt—that I have been fooled like other men."

"That implies a woman?"

"Yes." Again Loder looked at the scar on his finger. "I seldom recall the thing, it's so absolutely past. But I rather like to remember it tonight. I rather want you to know that I've been through the fire. It's a sort of guarantee."

Chilcote made a hasty gesture, but the other interrupted it.

"Oh, I know you trust me. But you're giving me a risky post. I want you to see that women are out of my line—quite out of it."

"But, my dear chap"—

Loder went on without heeding. "This thing happened ten years ago at Santasalare," he said, "a little place between Luna and Pistoria—a mere handful of houses wedged into two hills; a regular relic of old Italy crumbling away under flowers and sunshine, with nothing to suggest the present century except the occasional passing of a train round the base of one of the hills. I had literally stumbled upon the place on a long tramp south from Switzerland and had been tempted into a stay at the little inn. The night after my arrival something unusual occurred. There was an accident to the train at the point where it skirted the village.

"There was a small excitement. All the inhabitants were anxious to help, and I took my share. As a matter of fact, the smash was not disastrous; the passengers were hurt and frightened, but nobody was killed."

He paused and looked at his companion, but, seeing him interested, went on.

"Among these passengers was an English lady. Of all concerned in the business, she was the least upset. When I came upon her she was sitting on the shattered door of one of the carriages calmly arranging her hat. On seeing me she looked up with the most charming smile imaginable.

"'I have just been waiting for somebody like you,' she said. 'My stupid maid has got herself smashed up somewhere in the second class carriages, and I have nobody to help me find my dog.'

"Of course, that first speech ought to have enlightened me, but it didn't. I only saw the smile and heard the voice. I knew nothing of whether they were deep or shallow. So I found the maid and found the dog. The first expressed the liveliest gratitude; the other, I confess, ed him with enormous difficulty from the wreck of the luggage van, and this was how he marked his appreciation." He held out his hand and nodded toward the scar.

Chilcote glanced up. "So that's the explanation?"

"Yes. I tried to conceal the thing when I restored the dog, but I was bleeding abominably and I failed. Then the whole face was changed. It was I who needed seeing to, my new friend insisted; I who should be looked after and not she. She took me to bed in the newer interest of my wounded finger. The maid, who was practically unhurt, was sent on to the nearest town for the little inn, and she and I followed slowly.

"That walk impressed me. There was an attractive mistiness of atmosphere in the warm night, a sensation more than attractive in finding made much of by a woman of one's own class and country after five years' wandering."

He laughed with a touch of irony. "But I won't take up your time with details. You know the progress of an ordinary love affair. Throw in a few more flowers and a little more sunshine than is usual, a man who is practically a hermit and a woman who knows the world by heart and you have the whole thing.

"She insisted on staying in Santasalare for three days in order to keep my finger bandaged. She ended by staying three weeks in the hope of smashing up my life.

"On coming to the hotel she had given no name, and in our first explanations to each other she led me to conclude her an unmarried girl. It was at the end of the three weeks that I learned that she was not a free agent, as I had innocently imagined, but possessed a husband whom she had left ill with malaria at Florence or Rome.

"The news disconcerted me, and I took no pains to hide it. After that the end came abruptly. In her eyes I had become a fool with middle class principles in my eyes— But there is no need for that. She left Santasalare in the same night in a great confusion of trunks and bathroom, and sent morning I strapped on my knapsack and turned my face to the south."

"And women don't count ever after?" Chilcote smiled, beguiled out of himself.

Loder laughed. "That's what I've been trying to convey. Once bitten, twice shy!" He laughed again and slipped the two rings over his finger with an air of finality.

"Now, shall I start? This is the latchkey?" He drew a key from the pocket of Chilcote's evening clothes. "Then I get to Grosvenor square I am to find your house, go straight in, mount the stairs and there on my right hand will be the door of your—I mean my own—private rooms. I think I've got it by heart. I feel inspired, I feel that I can't go wrong." He handed the two remaining rings to Chilcote and picked up the overcoat.

"I'll stick on till I get a wire," he said. "Then I'll come back and we'll reverse again." He slipped on the coat and moved back toward the table. Now that the decisive moment had come it embarrassed him. Scarcely knowing how to bring it to an end, he held out his hand.

Chilcote took it, paling a little. "I will be all right!" he said, with a sudden return of nervousness. "I will be all right! And I've made it plain about—about the reminiscence? —A hundred a week, besides all expenses."

Loder smiled again. "My pay? Oh, yes, you've made it clear as day. Shall we say good night now?"

"Yes. Good night."

There was a strange, distant note in Chilcote's voice, but the other did not pretend to hear it. He pressed the hand he was holding, though the cold dampness of it repelled him.

"Good night," he said again.

"Good night."

They stood for a moment awkwardly looking at each other, then Loder quietly disengaged his hand, crossed the room and passed through the door.

Chilcote, left standing alone in the middle of the room, listened while the last sound of the other's footsteps was audible on the uncarpeted stairs. Then, with a furtive, hurried gesture, he caught up the green shaded lamp and passed into Loder's bedroom.

CHAPTER VIII.

TO all men come portentous moments, difficult moments, triumphant moments. Loder had had his examples of all three, but no moment in his career ever equaled in strangeness of suspension that in which, dressed in another man's clothes, he fitted the latchkey for the first time into the door of the other man's house.

The act was quietly done. The key fitted the lock smoothly, and his fingers turned it without hesitation, though his heart, usually extremely steady, beat sharply for a second. The hall loomed massive and somber, despite the modernity of electric lights. It was darkly and expensively decorated in black and brown; the frieze of wrought bronze, representing peacocks with outspread tails, ornamented the walls; the banisters were of heavy ironwork, and the somewhat formidable fireplace was of the same dark metal.

Loder looked about him, then advanced, his heart again beating quickly as his hand touched the electric lighter and he began his ascent of the stairs. But at each step his confidence strengthened, his feet became more firm until, at the head of the stairs, as if to disprove his assurance, his pulses played him false, he paused this time to a more serious tune. From the farther end of a well lighted corridor a maid was coming straight in his direction.

For one short second all things seemed to whirl about him; the extrainty of detection overpowered his reason. The indisputable knowledge that he was John Loder and no other, despite all armor of effrontery and dress, so dominated him that all other considerations shrank before it. It wanted but one word, one shrill note of denunciation, and the whole scheme was shattered. In the dismay of the moment he almost wished that the word might be spoken and the suspense ended.

But the maid came on in silence, and so incredible was the silence that Loder moved onward too. He came within a yard of her, and still she did not speak. Then, as he passed her, she drew back respectfully against the wall.

The strain, so astonishingly short, had been immense, but with its slackening came a strong reaction. The expected humiliation seethed suddenly to a desire to dare fate. Pausing quickly, he turned and called the woman back.

The spot where he had halted was vividly bright, the ceiling light being directly above his head, and as she came toward him he raised his face deliberately and waited.

She looked at him without surprise or interest. "Yes, sir?" she said.

"Is your mistress in?" he asked. He could think of no other question, but it served his purpose as a test of his voice.

Still the woman showed no surprise. "She's not in, sir," she answered. "But she's expected in half an hour."

"In half an hour? All right. That's all I wanted." With a movement of decision Loder walked back to the stair head, turned to the right and opened the door of Chilcote's rooms.

The door opened on a short, wide passage. On one side stood the study, on the other the bed, bath and dressing rooms. With a blind sense of knowledge and unfamiliarity, devoid of much description on Chilcote's part, he put his hand on the study door and, still exalted by the sense of his first success, turned the handle.

Inside the room there was firelight and lamplight and a profound air of peace. The realization of this and a sheer incredulity at Chilcote's voluntary renunciation were his first impressions. Then his attention was needed for more luminous things.

As he entered the new secretary was returning a volume to its place on the book shelves. At sight of him he paused. It hastily into position and turned round.

"I was making a few notes on the political position of Khorassan," he said, glancing with slight apprehensiveness at his other's face. He was a small, shy man, with few social accomplishments but an extraordinary amount of learning—the learning of the alert Bloomington, whom he had replaced.

Loder bore his scrutiny without flinching. Instead, it struck him suddenly that there was not a fund of interest, almost of excitement, in the expression of each new pair of eyes. At the thought he moved forward to the desk.

"Thank you, Greening," he said. "A very useful bit of work."

The secretary glanced up, slightly flushed. His exuberance had been severely taxed in the previous days that he had filled his new post.

"I'm glad you think so, sir," he said, hesitatingly. "You've rather puzzled me the matter this morning, if you remember."

Loder was taking off his coat, but stopped in the operation.

"This morning?" he said. "Oh, did I? I'd I?" Then struck by the opportunity the words gave him he turned toward the secretary. "You've got to get used to that, Greening," he said. "You haven't quite grasped me yet, I know. I'm a man of moods, you know. Up to the present you've seen my slack side, my jarred side, but I have, good or another when I care to show it. I'm a sort of genius in my affair." Again he laughed, and Greening echoed the sound diffidently. Chilcote had evidently discouraged familiarity.

Loder eyed him with abrupt understanding. He recognized the nervousness in the anxious, conciliatory manner.

"You're tired," he said kindly. "Go to bed. I've got some thinking to do. Good night."

Greening took it, still half dazed. "Good night, sir," he said. "Tomorrow, if you approve, I shall go on with my notes. I hope you will have a restful night."

For a second Loder's eyebrows went up, but he recovered himself instantly. "Ah, thanks, Greening," he said. "Tut, a. I think your hope will be fulfilled."

He watched the little secretary move softly and apologetically to the door, then he walked to the fire and, resting his head against the mantelpiece, he took his face in his hands.

For a space he stood absolutely quiet, then he lowered his hands to his sides, and he turned slowly round. In that short space he had balanced things and found his footings. The slight nervousness shown in his brusque sentences and overconfident manner faded out, and he faced facts steadily.

With the return of his calmness he took a long survey of the room. His glance brightened appreciatively as it traveled from the walls lined with well bound books to the lamps established to the proper light; from the lamps to the desk fitted with every requirement. Nothing was lacking. All he had once possessed, all he had since dreamed of, was here, but on a greater scale. To enjoy the luxury of it, for a man must go long without them. Loder had lived severely—so severely that until three days ago he had believed himself exempt from the temptations of humanity. Then the voice of the world had spoken, and within him another voice had answered with a tone so clamorous and insistent that it had coerced his surprised and incredulous wonder at its existence and its claims. That had been the voice of suppressed ambition, and now as he stood in the new atmosphere a new sensation filled itself. The joy of material things rose suddenly, overbalancing the last remnant of the philosophy he had learned. He saw all things in a fresh light—the soft carpets, the soft lights, the numberless pleasant, unnecessary things that color the passing landscape and oil the wheels of life. This was power—power made manifest. The choice bindings of one's books, the quiet harmony of one's surroundings, the gratified deference of one's dependents—these were the visible, the outward signs, the thing she had forgotten.

Crossing the room slowly, he lifted and looked at the different papers on the desk. They had a substantial feeling, an importance, an air of value. They were like the solemn keys to so many pecuniary problems. Some of the papers were a heap of letters neatly arranged and as yet unopened. He turned them over one by one. They were all thick and interesting to look at. He smiled as he recalled his own scanty correspondence, the dull notes or narrow and thin, unwelcome manuscripts or very welcome checks. Having sorted the letters, he noticed that he was his life task to open them, but he had never in his life opened an envelope addressed to another person.

He stood uncertain, weighing them in his hand. Then all at once a look of attention and surprise crossed his face, and he raised his head. Some one had unmistakably passed outside the door which Greening had left open.

There was a moment of apparent doubt, then a stir of skirts, a quick, uncertain knock, and the intruder entered.

For a couple of seconds she stood in the doorway; then as Loder made no effort to speak she moved into the room. She had apparently but just returned from some entertainment, for, though she had drawn off her long gloves, she was still wearing an evening cloak of lace and fur.

That she was Chilcote's wife Loder instinctively realized the moment she entered the room. But a disconcerting confusion of ideas was all that followed the knowledge. He stood by the desk, silent and awkward, trying to fit his expectations to his knowledge. Then, faced by the hopelessness of the task, he turned abruptly and looked at her again.

She had taken off her cloak and was standing by the fire. The compulsion of moving through life alone had set its seal upon her in a certain self possession, a certain confidence of pose, yet her figure as Loder then saw it, backgrounded by the dark books and garmed in pale blue, had a suggestion of youthfulness that seemed a contradiction. The remembrance of Chilcote's pitiable "cold" and "unsympathetic" came back to him with something like astonishment. He felt no uncertainty, no dread of discovery and humiliation in her presence as he had felt in the maid's, yet there was something in her face that made him acutely more uncomfortable, a look he could find no name for, a friendliness that studiously covered another feeling, whether question, distgust or actual dislike he could not say. With a strange sensation of awkwardness he sorted Chilcote's letters, waiting for her to speak.

As if divining his thought she turned toward him. "I'm afraid I rather intrude," she said. "If you are busy"—

"Busy, no. Greening has gone," he said. "A very useful bit of work."

The secretary glanced up, slightly puzzled. The exuberance had been severely taxed in the previous days that he had filled his new post.

"I'm glad you think so, sir," he said, hesitatingly. "You rather puzzled me the matter this morning, if you remember."

Loder was taking off his coat, but stopped in the operation.

ed head—"it seems to him that if you made one real effort now, even now, to shake off your restlessness that your—your health might improve. He thinks that the present crisis would be"—she hesitated—"would give you a tremendous opportunity. Your hands interests, bound up as they are with Persia, would give any opinion you might hold very much weight." Almost unconsciously a touch of warmth crept into her words.

"Mr. Fraide talked very seriously about the beginning of your career. He said that if only the spirit of your first days could come back"— Her tone grew quicker, as though she feared ridicule in Loder's silence. "He asked me to use my influence. I know, that I have little—none, perhaps—but I couldn't tell him that, and so—so I promised."

"And have kept the promise?" Loder spoke at random. Her manner and her words had both affected him. There was a sensation of unreality in his brain.

"Yes," she answered. "I always want to do—what I can."

As she spoke a sudden realization of the effect she was making struck upon him, and with it his scorn of Chilcote rose in renewed force.

"My intention"— he began, turning to her. Then the futility of any explanation silenced him. "I shall think over what you say," he added after a minute's wait. "I suppose I can't say more than that."

Their eyes met and she smiled a little.

"I don't believe I expected as much," she said. "I'll go now. You have been wonderfully patient." A pause followed, but in Loder's eyes it held relief as well as friendliness, and when their hands met he noticed that her fingers barely brushed his.

He picked up her cloak and carried it across the room. As he held the door open he laid it quietly across her arm.

"I'll think over what you've said," he repeated.

Again she glanced at him as if suspecting sarcasm. Then, partly reassured, she paused. "You will always despise your opportunities, and I suppose I shall always envy them," she said. "That's the way with men and women. Good night." With another faint smile she passed out into the corridor.

Loder waited until he heard the outer door close, then he crossed the room thoughtfully and dropped into the chair she had vacated. He sat for a time looking at the hand her fingers had touched. Then he lifted his head with a characteristic movement.

"By Jove," he said aloud, "how cordially she detests him!"

CHAPTER IX.

LODER slept soundly and dreamlessly in Chilcote's disquieted bed. To him the big room, with its severe magnificence, suggested nothing of the gloom and solitude that it held in its owner's eyes. The ponderous furniture, the high ceiling, the heavy curtains, unchanged since the days of Chilcote's grandfather, all hinted at a far reaching ownership that entered him. That ownership was mythical in his regard and the possessions a mirage, but they filled the day, and surely sufficient for the day.

That was his frame of mind as he opened his eyes on the following morning and lay appreciative of his comfort, of the surrounding space, even of the light that filtered through the curtain chinks, suggestive of a world recreated. With day all things seemed possible to a healthy man. He stretched his arms luxuriously, delighting in the glossy smoothness of the sheets.

What was it Chilcote had said? Better live for a day than exist for a lifetime. That was true, and life had begun. At thirty-six he was to know it for the first time.

He smiled, but without irony. Mah is at his best at thirty-six, he mused. He has retained his enthusiasm and shed his exuberances; he has learned what to pick up and what to pass by; he no longer imagines that to drain a cup one must taste the dregs. He closed his eyes and stretched again into his arms only, but his whole body. The pleasure of his mental state insisted on a physical expression. Then, sitting up in bed, he pressed the electric bell.

Chilcote's servant responded.

"Pull those curtains, Rennick," he said. "What's the time?" He had passed the ordeal of Rennick's eyes triumphantly.

The man was slow, even a little stupid. He drew back the curtains carefully, then looked at the small clock on the dressing table. "Eight o'clock, sir. I didn't expect the bell so early, sir."

Loder felt reproved, and a pause followed.

"May I bring your cup of tea, sir?"

"No, not just yet. I'll have a bath first."

Rennick showed ponderous uncertaint. "Warm, sir?" he hazarded.

"No, cold."

Still perplexed, the man left the room.

Loder smiled to himself. The chances of discovery in that quarter were not large. He was inclined to think that Chilcote had even overstepped necessity in the matter of his valet's dullness.

He breakfasted late, following Chilcote's habit, and after breakfast found his way to the study.

As he entered Greening rose with the same conciliatory haste that he had shown the night before.

Loder nodded to him. "Early at work?" he said pleasantly.

The little man showed instant, almost ridiculous, relief. "Good morning, sir," he said. "You, too, are early. I rather feared your nerves troubled you after I left last night, for I found your letters still unopened this morning. But I am glad to see you look so well."

Loder promptly turned his back to the light. "Oh, last night's letters!" he said. "To tell the truth, Greening, my wife"—his hesitation was very slight—"my wife looked me up after you left, and we consulted. I clean forgot the post." He smiled in an expansionary way as he moved to the desk and picked up the letters.

With Greening's eyes upon him there was no time for scruples. With very creditable coolness he began opening the envelopes one by one. The letters were unimportant, and he passed them one after another to the man who had experienced a slight thrill of authority as each left his hand. Again the fact that power is visible in little things came to his mind.

"Give me my engagement book, Greening," he said when the letters had been disposed of.

The book that Greening handed him was neat in shape and bound, like Chilcote's cigarette case, in hard calf skin.

As Loder took it the gold monogram "J. C." winked at him in the bright morning light. The incident moved his sense of humor. He and the book were co-operators in the fraud, it seemed. He felt an inclination to wink back. Nevertheless he opened it with proper gravity and skimmed the pages.

The page devoted to the day was almost full. On every other day were jottings in Chilcote's irregular hand, and twice among the entries appeared a rectangular block in blue pencilling. Loder's interest quickened as his eye caught the mark. It had been agreed between them that only engagements essential to Chilcote's public life need be carried through during his absence, and there to save his confusion were to be crossed in blue pencil. The rest, for the most part social claims, were to be left to circumstance and Loder's inclination. Chilcote's erratic memory always accounting for the breaking of trivial promises.

But Loder in his new energy was anxious for obligations. The desire for fresh and greater tasks was upon him. Chilcote's cigarette case, in hand

A NEW TYPE SETTER

Owing to the increase in our business we were compelled to instal another type casting and setting machine. This week it was put into position, but as yet our operator is under the instruction of an expert machinist, Mr. Frank Boulanger, sent from the factory in Montreal, learning its marvelous mechanism and how to operate it. The machine is a fine, one of the most up-to-date manufactured, and will set several different faces and measures of type, which it sets and casts into a solid line. There is no distributing, and when used the line is thrown into the melting pot to be re-cast again.

In future we purpose issuing a twelve-page paper, which will enable us to make the print larger and more readable, and also give us considerable more space for reading matter and advertising.

This item is the work of the new Monotype. Our patrons are cordially invited to come in and see this wonderful machine in operation.

The Robinson Co., Limited, Said to Have Purchased It.

There is a well defined rumor about town that one of the largest real estate deals that has been put through in Napanee in quite a number of years is about to be completed. It is reported that The Robinson Co., Limited, have purchased the large brick block on the corner of Dundas and Centre streets, known as the "Mills Block," and at present occupied by themselves as a retail dry goods store and men's clothing and furnishing store, and by John G. Fennell as a general hardware store. This block is considered the best piece of business property in Napanee, being situated on the most central corner of the town. It has been the centre of Napanee trade ever since it was first erected.

MOSCOW NORTH.

Mrs. Clayton Wagar wishes to inform the readers of The Beaver that the last correspondence for Moscow North contained three particulars that are utter falsehoods and I can prove them.

Mrs. Frank Dart had not been at Mr. McCann's.

Neither has Mr. Lewis Clement been to Watertown, and last, though not least, Mr. and Mrs. Dart did not visit Clayton Wagar's as stated, and further still Mrs. Era Amey has never been in the house since I have lived here.

The person who sent such false reports to be printed in The Beaver as a slander on me did not hesitate to use another's and not their own signature when sending their correspondence.

I would advise them in future to adhere more strictly to truth and also not to use my name as a shield for their misdeeds.

I consider the person in question knows that forgery and false and slanderous reports are punishable!

The last wrote last week's correspondence, though under false colors, is suspected, though they do not belong to Moscow North.

New York Letter.

New York, April 29th, '07.

Dear Editor,—I am passing away to see all the sights of the city, but this I am afraid I will fail to do, as time if I were here for months and did nothing but view them, would fail to let things important that had escaped my notice. The stores that carry from one to seven floors in our city, I have seen outside and inside, and to my mind the Arnonia, the store of Bed Spring & Co., is the most up-to-date as for beauty. In the twelve stories besides basement, there is nearly a mile of space, built by W. E. D. Stokes, a first cousin of P. Stokes, of Napanee. Of course the Waldorf-Astoria is the New York house every one is talking about, and rightly so, for it is the most up-to-date hotel in the world, and the most elegant. THE MASQUERADER

By Katherine Cecil Thurston, author of "The Circles," Etc.

"I think I know," Loder's voice broke in involuntarily. "Things got worse, then still worse. You found interference useless. At last you ceased to have a husband."

"Until a week ago." She glanced up quickly. Absorbed in her own feelings, she had seen nothing extraordinary in his words.

But at hers Loder changed color. "It's the most incredible thing in the world," she said. "It's quite incredible, and yet I can't deny it. Against all my reason, all my experience, all my inclination, it seem to feel in the last week something of what I felt at first." She stopped with an embarrassed laugh. "It seems that, as if by magic, life has been picked up where I dropped it six years ago." Again she stopped and laughed.

Loder was keenly uncomfortable, but he could think of nothing to say.

"It seemed to begin that night I dined with the Fraides," she went on. "Mr. Fraide talked to me wisely and so kindly about so many things. He recalled all we had hoped for in you, and—and he called me a little." She paused and laid her cup aside. "He said that when people have made what they call their best effort they should always make just one effort more. He promised that if I could once persuade you to take an interest in your work he would do the rest. He said all that and a thousand other kinder things, and I sat and listened. But all the time I thought of nothing but their uselessness. Before I left I promised to do my best, but my thought was still the same. It was stronger than ever when I forced myself to come up here"—She paused again and glanced at Loder's averted head. "But I came, and then, as if by conquering myself I had compelled a reward, you seemed, you somehow seemed different. It sounds ridiculous, I know." Her voice was half amused, half deprecating. "It wasn't a difference in your face, though I fancy I detected that you were free from nerves." Again she hesitated over the word. "It was a difference in yourself, in the way things you said, more than in the way you said them." Once more she paused and hesitated a little.

Loder's discomfort grew.

"But it didn't affect me then." She spoke more quickly. "I wouldn't admit it then. And the next day when we talked on the terrace I still refused to admit it. Indeed I felt it more strongly than before. But I have watched you since that day, and I know there is a change. Mr. Fraide feels the same, and he is never mistaken. I know it's only nine or ten days, but I've hardly ever had the same mood for nine or ten hours in the last three years." She stopped, and the silence was impressive. It seemed to plead for confirmation of her instinct.

Still Loder could find no response.

After waiting for a moment she leaned forward in her chair and looked up at him.

"John," she said, "is it going to last? It's what I came to ask. I don't dare want to believe till I'm sure. I don't want to risk a new disappointment." Loder felt the earnestness of her gaze, though he avoided meeting it.

"I couldn't have said this to you a week ago, but only I don't want to pretend to explain why. The feeling is too inexplicable. I only know that I can say it now and that I couldn't a week ago. Will you understand—and answer?"

Still Loder remained mute. His position was horribly incongruous. What could he say? What dared he say?

Confirmed by his silence, Eve rose. "If it's only a phase, don't try to hide it," she said. "But if it's going to last—if by any possibility it's going to last"—She hesitated and looked up.

She was quite close to him. He would have been less than man had he been unconscious of the subtle contact of her glance, the nearness of her presence, and no one had ever blinded that manhood was lacking in him. It was a moment of temptation. His own energy, his own intentions, seemed to mean, Chilcote and Chilcote's claims so distant and unreal. After all, his life, his ambitions, his determinations, were his own. He lifted his eyes and looked at her.

"You want me to tell you that I will go on?" he said.

Her eyes brightened. She took a step forward. "Yes," she said; "I want it more than anything in the world."

There was a wait. The declaration that would satisfy her came to Loder's lips, but he delayed it. The delay was fateful. While he stood silent the door opened, and the servant who had admitted Loder in the tea reappeared.

He crossed the room and handed Loder a telegram. "Any answer, sir?" he said.

Eve moved back to her chair. There was a flush on her cheeks, and her eyes were still alertly bright.

Loder tore the telegram open, read it, then threw it into the fire.

"No answer?" he said incredulously.

At the brusqueness of his voice Eve looked up. "Disagreeable news?" she said as the servant departed.

He didn't look at her. He was watching the telegram withering in the center of the fire.

"No," he said at last in a strained voice. "No; only news that I—that I had forgotten to expect."

CHAPTER XI.

THERE was a silence, an uneasy pause after Loder's question, an episode of the telegram was, to all appearances, ordinary enough, calling forth Eve's question and his own reply as a natural sequence, yet in the pause that followed it each was conscious of a jar, each was aware that in some subtle way the thread of sympathy had been dropped, though to one the cause was inexplicable and to the other only too plain.

Loder watched the ghost of his message grow whiter and thinner, then dissolve into airy fragments and flutter up the chimney. As the last morsel wavered out of sight he turned and looked at his companion.

"You almost made me commit myself," he said. In the desire to hide his feelings his tone was short.

Eve returned his glance with a quiet regard, but he scarcely saw it. He had a dignified sense of disaster, a feeling of bitter self commiseration that for the moment outweighed all other considerations. Almost at the moment of justification the ghost of life had trembled in his fingers, the soil given beneath his feet, and with an absence of logic, a lack of justice unusual in him, he let resentment against Chilcote sweep suddenly over his mind.

Eve, still watching him, saw the darkening of his expression and with a quiet movement rose from her chair.

"Lady Sarah has a theater party tonight, and I am dining with her," she said. "It is an early dinner, so I must think about dressing. I'm sorry you think I tried to draw you into anything. I must have explained myself badly." She laughed a little to cover the slight discomfiture that her tone betrayed, and as she laughed she moved across the room toward the door.

Loder, engrossed in the chaos of his own schemes, incensed at the suddenness of Chilcote's recall and still more incensed at his own folly in not having anticipated it, was oblivious for the moment of both her movement and her words. Then quite abruptly they obtruded themselves upon him, breaking through his egotism with something of the sharpness of pain following a blow. Turning quickly from the fireplace, he faced the shadowy room across which she had passed, but simultaneously with his turning she gained the door.

The knowledge that she was gone struck him with a sense of double loss. "Wait!" he called, suddenly moving forward. But almost at once he paused, chilled by the solitude of the room.

"Eve!" he said, using her name unconsciously for the first time.

But the corridor, as well as the room, was empty; he was too late. He stood irresolute; then he laughed shortly, turned and passed back toward the fireplace.

The blow had fallen, the inevitable come to pass, and nothing remained but to take the fact with as good a grace as possible. Chilcote's telegram had summoned him to Chilcote's inn at 7 o'clock, and it was now well on toward 6. He pulled out his watch—Chilcote's watch, he realized with a grim touch of grim humor as he stooped to examine the dial by the light of the fire—then, as if the humor had verged to another feeling, he stood straight again and felt for the electric button in the wall. His fingers touched it, and simultaneously the room was lighted.

The abrupt alteration from shadow to light came almost as a shock. The feminine arrangement of the ten table seemed incongruous beside the sober books and the desk laden with papers—incongruous as his own presence in the place. The thought was unpleasant, and he turned aside as if to avoid it, but at the movement his eyes fell on Chilcote's visiting card with its gleaming monogram, and the whimsical suggestion of his first morning rose again. The idea that the inanimate objects in the room knew him for what he was, recognized the interloper where human eyes saw the rightful possessor, returned to his mind.

Through all his disgust and chagrin a smile forced itself to his lips, and, crossing the room for the second time, he passed into Chilcote's bedroom.

There the massive furniture and somber atmosphere fitted better with his mood than the energy and action which the study always suggested. Walking directly to the great bed, he sat on its side and for several minutes stared straight in front of him, apparently conquering nothing but the sympathy passed from him, as his previous anger against Chilcote had passed from him. He stood slowly, drawing his long limbs together, and recrossed the room, passing along the corridor and through the door communicating with the rest of the house. Five minutes later he was in the open air and walking steadily southward, his hat drawn forward and his overcoat buttoned up.

As he traversed the streets he allowed himself no thought. Once, as he waited in Trafalgar square to find a passage between the vehicles, the remembrance of Chilcote's voice coming out of the fog on their first night made itself prominent, but he rejected it quite quietly, pausing himself even an involuntary glance at the place of their meeting. The Strand, with its increasing life, came to him as something almost unfamiliar. Since his identification with the new life no business had Torturing Rheumatism.

SUFFERED FOR FIVE YEARS—CURED BY DR. WILLIAMS' PINK PILLS.

Agonizing pains, sometimes in one joint, sometimes in another, sometimes all over the body, sometimes in the back or loins—these are the symptoms of rheumatism. Do not delay in finding a cure. Each day you do so but adds to your sufferings and the torture. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills have cured thousands of cases of this kind. Mrs. Horace Pardie, of Sorel, Que., is a case in point. She says:—"I suffered from rheumatism. What they did for Mrs. Pardie they can do for you. Her case was considered with rheumatism. I walked as if my bones were filled with pebbles. The pains, starting in my back, spread to all parts of the body, my back and joints became affected, the muscles of the legs were affected to the greatest agony. Often I was confined to bed, hardly able to move. Nothing seemed to help me. I despaired of ever being well again. By good chance Dr. Williams' Pink Pills were brought to my notice, and I decided to try them. I got six boxes before they were all gone I felt a great improvement. I remained the treatment and my health gradually came back till now I am free from the least pain—am healthy and strong. What a surprise to my friends to see me at the store, as they had known me for years of my sufferings. They brought me more and urged me to get them. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, for I took no other medicine once I got them and they cured. Rheumatic sufferers should give Dr. Williams' Pink Pills a fair trial and they will surely do for you what they did for me."

It is in the blood — poor blood — that disease breeds as rheumatism, indigestion, dizziness, heart palpitation, anaemia, weakness and a host of other diseases find their root. It is your blood that Dr. Williams' Pink Pills act on. They make it pure, rich and healthgiving. That is the way they cure all the common ailments so peculiar to women. They are druggists or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50, from Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

RIVALS THE MIKADO.

King Edward VII. Has a Well-Nigh Tri-Millennial Ancestry.

It doubtless will be news to many that Edward VII is the one king in all the world who unites in his person the oldest royal dignity in Europe with the oldest blood royal—and both Irish. For he is genealogically and indisputably the direct descendant and representative of the high kings of ancient Ireland. The history of Ireland goes back to Conaire Mor, or Conaire the Great, who 600 years before Christ ruled as high king over the clans of the Gaels of Ireland at Tara. From this Conaire the Great, the historic ancestor of the Hy Niall, to King Connor Mac Nessa, who was the contemporary of the Roman Emperors Augustus and Augustus; from Connor Mac Nessa to King Nial of the hostages, who relieved the generation before St. Patrick, and came to Ireland; from King Nial to King Malcolm Mor, who married the Princess Margaret, sister of the Saxon king Edgar Atheling; from King Malcolm to the bevoke King Bruce of Scotland; and from thence, through the Stuarts, the house of Hanover and that of Coburg, to Edward VII., the descent is as direct and as incontrovertible as any descent in ancient or modern history, says the Marquise de Fontenoy.

Of course, there are other people, some of them great Irish nobles, and others, mere commoners, besides hundreds of persons who can show descent from the ancient kings of Ireland. But all have quitted the royal estate, which King Edward is alone to retain. For all those who wish to have fuller particulars of this Irish ancestry of King Edward, I would refer to the works of the late Sir Bernard Burke, Ulster king at arms, to other eminent genealogists, and last, but not least, to that trusted associate of Parnell and former Nationalist member of Parliament, Frank Hugh O'Donnell, a recognized authority on Irish history.

This Irish ancestry of King Edward invests his dynasty with an antiquity superior to that of any reigning house of Europe. Indeed, it is necessary to seek the records of such offspring of the gods as the Mikado of Japan for a genealogy to rival the well-nigh tri-millennial ancestry of Edward VII., heir of Wettin, heir of Guelph, heir of Stuart, heir of Bruce, and heir of Niall—an ancestry which many Irishmen apparently ignore when they refuse to do honor to the present King of Ireland.

RADIUM AND LIFE.

The Experiments That Have Been Made and What They Show.

Does it appear that any one has prepared from sterilized bouillon by the action of radium or in any other way living organisms capable of multiplying either by repeated subdivision or by means of spores or capable of producing diastatic or fermentative changes such as those which we associate with the activity of the organisms hitherto investigated? The answer jumps almost to the lips. No such discovery has been recorded nor has anything been observed which would justify me in supposing that we are on the verge of making such a discovery at the present moment.

The fact is that, though much has been written and among other things quite a big book, very little has really been accomplished up to the present. A few preliminary experiments suggested by the marvelous qualities of radium have been made, and that is all. Those experiments and their results, which are not at all revolutionary, may be described in half a dozen sentences. Mr. Burke finds that when small quantities of radium bromide or chloride are scattered on the surface of carefully sterilized bouillon well protected from the air in closed vessels minute objects appear in the bouillon after one or two days.

These objects have been watched, and Mr. Burke reports that after their first appearance they develop into two dots, next present the appearance of dumbbells and subsequently of biscuits, afterward take on the form and remind an observer of frog's spawn and finally divide, lose their individuality and become transformed into minute crystals.

These bodies, which Mr. Burke very prematurely describes as "cultures," do not multiply, as living organisms should do, when they are transferred from tubes of sterilized bouillon, though, as might be expected, they give some slight evidence that the activity of the radium salt is not quite exhausted by its first action, and they are soluble in water.

Now, it would be dogmatic to say that radium will not generate life in organic matter, but clearly Mr. Burke gives us little or no reason to suspect that it does so at present.

POINTED PARAGRAPHS.

There never was an air castle that was built with any consideration of salary.

Those who never do wrong take a wonderful satisfaction in the saying, "Murder will out."

Trees Worth Growing.

As ornamental trees the beeches attract attention primarily on account of their dignity of form and peculiarly "clean" appearance; they give ample and spreading shade; the leaves are remarkably free from the insect pests, and they can generally be readily transplanted. They thrive best in a rich, deep, sandy loam, but will grow well in any ordinary soil. The trees attain a height of 80 to 100 feet. In the different seasons the beech presents totally different pictures. In summer it is a broad dome of grateful shade; in autumn a glory of dazzling light gray; in spring it floats out its soft velvety gold green leaves, and in autumn it is a rich golden yellow mingling of subdued yellow browns and grays.—Garden Magazine.

Dogs run loose in these gardens, and it is their delight to bite letter carriers. I myself have two scars on my hand and leg. I could make a record out of every trade, and I'll guarantee that the letter carriers will lead all in their percentage of dog scars."

The Way to Spoil Children.

Almost any dish which had to recommend it rarity, costliness, indigestibility and, to our way of thinking, nastiness was sure to take with the Roman epicure. And if he were unable to made it costly any other way he would add powdered precious stones or gold dust. Nero dined on one occasion from a peacock which was sprinkled with diamond dust, and specimens of that bird dressed with gold or with crushed pearls were by no means a rarity at the tiffinis of the moneyed Romans. A dish of parrots' tongues was a great delicacy. But a dish of parrots' tongues which had been capable, when in their proper place, of framing words was of almost incalculable value, which increased in a direct ratio with the vocabularies of the defunct parrots. Another bird for which the Roman epicure was in the habit of paying fabulous prices was the phenocoptrix, which is believed to have been the ptarmigan. It had its home in the most northerly parts of Scandinavia and Norway, and as this made it hard to get at the Romans appreciated it all the more and put it in the same rank with ostriches, pheasants and peacocks. The tongues of these birds were specially prepared, together with the brains, and took the place which a hors d'oeuvre would now take.

The Words on a Cigar Box.

What mean the various words which are to be seen on the lid and sides of a cigar box? These are not mere fancy names, but terms actually descriptive of the cigar. On the lid is the name of the cigar. "The front of the box describes the shape and size, as "conchas," "regalias," which stats the shape, and "perfecto finos," "princesses," which signify the size. These may be combined, as "conchas especiales," "conchas finas," to state both shape and size. At the back of the box, where the lid turns over, is stamped the quality of the cigar—"superfina," "fina," "flor," "superior" and "primera," being terms in the descending scale. The color of the cigar is declared on the right hand side or end of the box, "colorado claro" rather lightest colored, "colorado claro" rather dark, "colorado" dark, "colorado maduro" darker, "maduro" very dark, "oscuro" extremely dark, "negro" darkest.

Hours of Sleep.

The belief that the hours of sleep should be definitely restricted is contrary to ordinary good sense. If the human body does not need sleep for the refreshing of its tissues it will not call for it. A rule of health which cannot be wrong is to sleep if possible as much as the individual's nature requires. The erroneous view of this subject is undoubtedly due to the fact that when the mind and body are thoroughly rested it is often difficult to arouse the mind from its comfortable lethargy. On the other hand, the man who is under a mental strain and sleeps only five or six hours at night is keen and active after a moderate sleep, but is an unhealthy activity. His nerves are at a high tension. He is on edge, so to speak, and a strain long continued results inevitably in a nervous breakdown.

"On the water," said a grizzled old bayman who also smoking his corncob and surveying the bay the other day, "when you see a thunder storm begin on the horizon first see if you see the lightning. If you see it in the distance striking down farther and farther to the right or to the left, and it may pass around you. But if you see it all the time coming down in the same place and at the same time getting brighter and brighter, why, that indicates that it's coming straight toward you, and this is the time, and when you want to make for home or get in your sail and make everything snug till the storm passes over."—Exchange.

The Human Head.

An Irishman once declared the human head as "a bulbous excrescence, of special use to many as a peg for hanging the hat on, a handy thing for supporting wigs, as a target for shooting at when rendered conspicuous by a white blanket, and as a receptacle for tobacco, as a machine for fitting into a halter or guillotine, as a receptacle for combs, brushes, pastilles, pessaries, prescriptions, predilections—for anything, in short, but brains."

Amenities of the Table.

"I waited ten minutes for a car today." the landlady was saying to her boy. "How does it happen that you have brought only the drum? Driver — You see, ma'am, he's the driver of the band wagon; the socks will come in the hose cart.

The brain of an idiot contains much less phosphorus than that of a person of average mental power.

Our Annual Week of Hermsdorf Hosiery

IN FULL SWING.

Why make special mention of Hermsdorf you say. Just because the name Hermsdorf stamped on the sole of Robinson's hosiery means genuine satisfaction. Last week we intimated that our hosiery week programme would appear in this issue, but we would just like to make a few introductory remarks. This store is giving new ideas every day. It's a newer store than when we swung our doors open years ago, and is spreading the fame of Napanee as a great retail town. But this will be the best showing of hosiery we ever had. All like efforts eclipsed. It's only such an enterprising and progressive concern as this that can offer you such hosiery assortments to choose from.

On Thursday and Friday, May 2d and 3d, our first lot of special priced hosiery was introduced but we reserved 33 dozens for our Saturday customers. By all means be on hand early. If you buy our hosiery you'll buy here again.

Special interior displays each day of the Hosiery Week.

DRESS GOODS AND SILKS.

Heretofore this store has been known as Napanee's greatest dress goods and silk store, and this department therefore deserves special mention. This will also be an important week for dress goods buyers. We have good reasons for making these statements. First—Many lines are just from the looms of the old world and are therefore fresh and up-to-date. Second—They are light weight and correct colorings, just the kind for present wear and the months ahead. Third—Values are guaranteed to be equal to the best city houses in the trade. Space will just allow us to mention a few items from this department.

HOSIERY WEEK IN OUR MEN'S STORE.

Our interior displays from May 2d to May 11th will be of Men's Hosiery. To make it interesting and profitable to you we offer you two very special bargains:

Saturday, May 4th.

We will place on sale five dozen Men's Fine Wool Cashmere Hose, all 50c "Llama" quality. Sale price, 39c or 3 pairs for $1.00.

Thursday, May 9th.

We will place on sale ten dozen Men's assorted Ribbed Heather Hose, worth 20c a pair. Sale price, 15c, 2 for 25c.

Men's Fancy Colored Shirts—Stiff Bosom and Soft Front.

What an assortment to choose from! Our shirt trade has grown to such enormous dimensions that we are warranted in carrying a stock larger than any store hereabouts has ever dared carry. The result is that our shirtmakers, The Crescent Mfg. Co., are always giving us of their best.

We have over one hundred patterns and styles for you to choose from. Coat Shirts, Soft Negligee Shirts with or without reversible collars. Shirts with cuffs attached. Shirts with separate cuffs. Shirts with stiff bosoms. All can be pleased here. And we have them so handy for you. All in the shelves in compartments so that you can see the patterns all at once and choose your own.

Men's and Youth's Suits a Bargain—25 Suits worth $6.50 to $7.50. Your Choice for $5.00. From May 4th to May 11th.

We've never in any season had such a clothing business. Our goods are no better than last year's, but more men are making this store their own. Just plain fair dealing is a while a bargain—as sure as fate.

25 Men's and Youth's Suits will go on sale Saturday morning, May 4th, at $5 each, and say that remain unsold on Saturday will be sold the following week, but be on hand Saturday if you can as these will not last long if the weather is good. They are principally Tweed Suits, some Serge (blue) Suits in the lot. None of them are worth less than $6.50 and many of them are $7.50 Suits.

IN FULL SWING.

Why make special mention of Hermsdorf you say. Just because the name Hermsdorf stamped on the sole of Robinson's hosiery means genuine satisfaction. Last week we intimated that our hosiery week programme would appear in this issue, but we would just like to make a few introductory remarks. This store is giving new ideas every day. It's a newer store than when we swung our doors open years ago, and is spreading the fame of Napanee as a great retail town. But this will be the best showing of hosiery we ever had. All like efforts eclipsed. It's only such an enterprising and progressive concern as this that can offer you such hosiery assortments to choose from.

On Thursday and Friday, May 2d and 3d, our first lot of special priced hosiery was introduced but we reserved 33 dozens for our Saturday customers. By all means be on hand early. If you buy our hosiery you'll buy here again.

Special interior displays each day of the Hosiery Week.

Come and see Napanee's Greatest Store in her Hermsdorf Hosiery togs.

DRESS GOODS AND SILKS.

Heretofore this store has been known as Napanee's greatest dress goods and silk store, and this department therefore deserves special mention. This will also be an important week for dress goods buyers. We have good reasons for making these statements. First—Many lines are just from the looms of the old world and are therefore fresh and up-to-date. Second—They are light weight and correct colorings, just the kind for present wear and the months ahead. Third—Valuer are guaranteed to be equal to the best city houses in the trade. Space will just allow us to mention a few items from this department.

HOSIERY WEEK IN OUR MEN'S STORE.

Our interior displays from May 2d to May 11th will be of Men's Hosiery. To make it interesting and profitable to you we offer you two very special bargains:

We will place on sale ten dozen Men's assorted Ribbed Heather Hose, worth 50c a pair. Sale price, 15c, 2 for 25c.

Men's Fancy Colored Shirts—Stiff Bosom and Soft Front.

What an assortment to choose from! Our shirt trade has grown to such enormous dimensions that we are warranted in carrying a stock larger than any store hereabouts has ever dared carry. The result is that our shirtmakers, The Crescent Mfg. Co., are always giving us of their best.

We have over one hundred patterns and styles for you to choose from. Coat Shirts, Soft Negligee Shirts with or without reversible collars. Shirts with cuffs attached. Shirts with separate cuffs. Shirts with stiff bosoms. All can be pleased here. And we have them so handy for you. All in the shelves in compartments so that you can see the patterns all at once and choose your own.

Men's and Youth's Suits a Bargain—25 Suits worth $6.50 to $7.50, Your Choice for $5.00. From May 4th to May 11th.

We've never in any season had such a clothing business. Our goods are no better than last year's, but more men are making this store their own. Just plain fair dealing has done it. Styles are correct; tailoring of the better grades; prices fair; and once in a while a bargain—as now.

25 Men's and Youth's Suits will go on sale Saturday morning, May 4th, at $5 each, and say that remain unsold on Saturday will be sold the following week, but be on hand Saturday if you can as these will not last long if the weather is good. They are principally Tweed Suits, some Serge (blue) Suits in the lot. None of them are worth less than $6.50 and many of them are $7.50 Suits.

500 FACTS ABOUT CANADA.

A remarkable little booklet has been compiled under the above self-explanatory title by Frank Yeigh of Toronto, the well-known writer and lecturer on themes Canadian. Perhaps no one in the Dominion is better qualified to make such a compilation. Its value is, as claimed, "worth its weight in Yukon gold or Cobalt silver." The idea is a clever one, viz.: a fact in a sentence, giving a wonderful mass of information in in the smallest compass on every phase of our commercial and industrial life and our natural resources. The booklet is sold for 25c. and may be had from newsdealers or from the Canadian Facts Publishing Co., 667 Spadina Avenue, Toronto.

The Wedding Cheque.

An absentminded man was complaining of his infirmity one day and said:

"You are like the old father at the wedding, eh? A young bridegroom, after the wedding was over, and the bride's old father had gone off to the club, began to search anxiously among the wedding gifts.

"'What are you looking for, dear?' said the bride.

"'That $2,500 cheque of your father's,' he said anxiously. 'I don't see it anywhere.'

"'Poor papa is so absentminded,' said the bride. 'He lit his cigar with it.'"

Street Car Rules of Rio.

There are first and second class street cars, writes Albert Hale in the Reader, and I, with a package in my arms, had taken a first class board, as a street car is called in Rio de Janeiro. Scarcely had I done so when the conductor requested me to transfer to a second class car whenever it might come along, because no one is allowed to carry anything greater than a lap satchel first class. So I humbly descended and had either to mix with market women and sweaty laborers or to take a tilbury. A tilbury, named after the English maker who years ago introduced it, is a queer two wheeled, light springed cab, like an old fashioned gig, and resembles a hansom without the attachment for the driver. He sits inside the tilbury. A person without a necktie is no more allowed first class on the street cars than was I with my parcel. They are decidedly particular in Brazil and inherit many fastidious ways from the time of the empire, when dress and manners were the mark separating the aristocracy from the working classes.

Peculiarities of Napoleon.

Napoleon's father was a toper, a man utterly lacking in moral sensibility, and his sisters were immodest and hysterical. According to Dr. Calomas, Pauline was particularly so. Napoleon himself was exceedingly sensitive to atmospheric changes, was headachey and had auditory illusions. He had twitchings of the nose, the shoulders and the lips. He was at times the most irritable of men, often being unapproachable. His mania for destruction was such that he whittled pieces of furniture, broke articles presented to him, pinched lighter while pretending to caress them and took keen delight in shooting Josephine's rarest birds. The slightest opposition threw him into a paroxysm of rage. But in a campaign all weaknesses vanished. His pulse ranged ordinarily between thirty and thirty-five beats a minute and never went above fifty-five. The usual pulse rate is about seventy-two a minute.

The Eyes of the Eagle.

That the eagle has a most wonderful power of vision is shown from the fact that it flies in almost a straight line for many miles, and it desires to secure its food. Baby eagles also possess this farsightedness. Long before human eyes can discern them the disconsolate cries for instance, and their cries of welcome to their parents are shrill and continuous. The strength of their eyes makes them peculiarly strong. The brightest glare of sunlight does not affect them. Eagles do not differ as long in the air as some other birds, but their flight is very long and steady. A peculiarity about eagles is that they are constant to their mates, not changing every season, as most birds do. Sometimes the same pair of eagles will return to the same nest year after year. They seem to become acquainted with the locality, and if they are not disturbed are regular tenants.

Could Take His Choice.

At a recent inquest in a Pennsylvania town one of the jurors, after the usual swearing in, arose and with much dignity protested against service, alleging that he was the general manager of a restaurant concern and was wasting valuable time by sitting as a juror at an inquest. The coroner, turning to his clerk, said: "Mr. Morgan, kindly hand me 'Jervis' (the authority on juries)." Then, after consulting the book, the coroner observed to the unwilling juror:

"Upon reference to 'Jervis,' I find, sir, that no persons are exempt from service as jurors except idiots, imbeciles and lunatics. Now, under which heading do you claim exemption?"

Walnuts in France.

In some parts of France walnuts form a regular article of diet. The peasants eat them with bread and the oftentimes been rubbed with garlic. The hygienic effects are considered, the replacing meat to a large extent. These nuts are also used to make oil. It is much cheaper and similar in taste to that procured from olives, and is employed to adulterate the latter. The prisoners in certain prisons are engaged in cracking walnuts and picking out the kernels, which are pressed into oil.

The World's Debt to Flowers.

I have never known man or woman who has not improved in character by becoming devoted to the affairs of flowers, and I venture to say that the world at large is under the deepest obligation to pansies, violets, roses and lilies, to name but a few of the blossoms that silently help the good angel of mankind.

Exercising Dogs.

Never take your dog out for a run directly after he has had a meal. If the exercise is at all hard the food will remain undigested for hours. It is best not to allow a dog to play even directly after he has swallowed his dinner. In a little time he can do so, but do not encourage him to romp about.

Got His Mixed.

Miss Backbay—What I like about Henry James is the clarity of his style, his reserve force and his absolute mastery in the field of epigram and antithesis. Mr. Cahokia—Y-yes, but when it comes to the fast ball, you know, I think Walsh has got him skinned to death.

Know the Measure.

"When you get your groceries today," said the butcher to his wife, "don't go to that little grocer next door to my shop."

"Why not?" she demanded.

"Because he sent in yesterday and borrowed an old pair of scales."

His Guess.

"What would you do if you had a million dollars handed you?"

"Well, of course I can't say precisely, but the probabilities are that I'd become mean and grouchy, break away from all my old friends and put in the rest of my life trying to skin mankind out of another million."

Slandering a Saint.

"Fifteen years ago," said the aged brother, addressing the congregation, "I gladly gave my heart to the Lord."

"And that's the only cheerful gift he ever made," whispered the deacon whose business it was to collect the annual subscriptions.

Boldness is ever blind, therefore it is ill in counsel, but good in execution.—Bacon.

Original of "Uncle Toby."

Captain Shandy Sterne, the father of the author of "Tristram Shandy," was the original of Uncle Toby. As captain of Clendleigh's regiment of foot, a marching regiment ever on the move, Roger Sterne and his family tasted the most varied military and domestic experiences in Flanders, at Gibraltar and finally at Jamaica, where the old campaigner died of "calenture" or sunstroke. A simple minded, good natured, but shiftless and rather peppery Irishman, Roger Sterne had disappointed bravely and carried his load of debt with a light heart. "My father," says Sterne, "was the kindly, sweet disposition, void of all design and so innocent in his own intentions that he suspected no one, so that you might have cheated him ten times a day if nine had not been sufficient for your purpose." Such a character and such a father supplied the germ from which the genius of the son developed his conception of one of the most perfect and delightful portraits in the gallery of English fiction.

Sex and Rebirth.

The theories concerning the possibility of our having previously existed seem to be endless. Of them all I think the one best which suggests that sex is reversed at rebirth and that when we turn up once after we previously existed we do so either as men or women according to whether we were women or men heretofore. This largely accounts for the suffragette and for the long haired, thin voiced creatures who prate around bashfully, play the piano like "severely pretty" things and call themselves men. Presumably the best material of which we were fashioned then is now used in our composition, for the most manly women and effeminate men generally have some good points about them. But if one is to keep on performing these Proteus feats through all ages it hardly seems worth while worrying over sex problems. It seems to me, in the long run, that we shall each get about the same according to this arrangement.—London World.

The Remarkable Rhea.

"The rhea of South America is a remarkable bird," said an ornithologist. The male rhea hatches out the eggs. He and not the female is the sitter. He sets always in a quiet and desolate place, where there is no food, nothing to attract enemies, and as soon as the young are born the question is how to feed them. The rhea answers that question in a very novel way. Three or four days before the eggs are to open he shows a couple of them out of the nest with his bill and lays them in the sun. What is the result? The result is that the hot South African sun decomposes the eggs, and the father breaks them as the young birds begin to appear in the nest, and the flies settle on them and in twenty-four hours they are alive with worms—tender, juicy, delicious worms, the best food in the world for the nest of new born birdlings.?

Garrick the Author.

Writing of Garrick's literary efforts, I suppose not every one knows that he was the author of such well known lines as:

Their cause I plead, plead it in heart and hand;
A fellow feeling makes one wondrous kind.

Or this again:

Let others hail the rising sun;
I bow to that whose course has run.

Or again:

Hearts of oak are our ships,
Hearts of oak are our men.

But I suppose every one knows his epigram on Goldsmith, "who wrote like an angel and talk'd like poor Poll," an epigram that conveyed only half the truth, as Garrick would have been one of the first to admit.—London Sphere.

Millions of Buffaloes Once Ranged the Western Plains.

The early explorers who describe the buffalo numbered no not give us anything more exact than superlative expressions, such as "countless herds," "incredible numbers," "teeming myriads," "the world one robe," etc. I have endeavored to get at a more exact idea of their numbers.

The total area inhabited by the buffalo was about 3,000,000 square miles. Of this the open plains were one-half. According to the figures supplied me by A. F. Potter of the forest service, the ranges of the Dakotas, Montana, Wyoming, Nebraska, Kansas, Colorado, Texas and Oklahoma (a total of about 750,000 square miles, or half of the plains) were, according to the census of 1900, carrying 24,000,000 head of cattle and horses and about 6,000,000 head of sheep. This means that when fully stocked they might sustain a number of buffalo at least equal to the number of cattle and horses. The buffalo had to divide their heritage with numerous herds of mustang, antelope and wapiti. On the other hand, a buffalo could find a living where a range animal would starve, many of the richest bottom lands are now fenced in, and we have taken no account of the 6,000,000 sheep. Therefore we are safe in placing at 40,000,000 the number of buffalo that roved on the entire plains area.

Their prairie range was a third as large, but it was vastly more fertile—indeed, the stockmen reckon one prairie acre equal to four acres on the plains. Doubtless, therefore, the prairies sustained nearly as many head as the plains. We may safely set their population at 20,000,000. The forest region was the lowest in the rate of population. For its 1,000,000 square miles we should not allow more than 5,000,000 buffalo. These figures would make the primitive number of buffalo 75,000,000.

Many other calculations based on diffgent data give similar or slightly lower totals. Frouf these facts it will appear very safe to put the primitive buffalo population at 50,000,000 to 60,000,000.—Ernest Thompson Seton in Scribner's.

The Sonnet Writers.

The fashion of sonnet writing was at its height in the sixteenth century, when Rousard, the French "prince of poets" in his own opinion and reputation, wrote over 900 sonnets, a total which appears only to have been exceeded by Gomez de Quevara, the poet laureate of Philip II of Spain, who is said to have written over 1,000. Fortunately for sonnet lovers some of the best poets have been prolific sonneteers. Petrarch, who created the classic model which later poets imitated, wrote 315. Camoens is responsible for 332, Sir Philip Sidney wrote 108, Spenser 88 and Dante the English sonnets were first written by Sir Thomas Wyatt (1503-42) and Henry Howard, earl of Surrey (1517-47), and the first appearance of any in book form was in a rare publication briefly known as "Tottle's Miscellany," the full title being "Songs and Sonnetes written by the right honorable Lorde Henry Howard, late Earle of Surrey, and other." The greatest sonneteers of our language are Shakspeare, Milton, Wordsworth and Rossetti.—London Standard.

Tiger and Vulture of the Sea.

If the "killer" whale is "the tiger of the sea," as the writer of an interesting article in the September Windsor has it, the orcas surely are the vultures of the ocean. In connection with whale catching the author of this interesting natural history article tells of the following incident: Some years ago a whaler in the northwest had killed a large whale and had the animal alongside when it was attacked by a school of orcas. They doubtless were half starved and, crazed by the scent of blood that extended away a long distance, probably followed it up like hounds, immediately attacking the whale. The men, with spades and lances, cut and slashed at them, inflicting terrible blows, yet despite this the orcas literally tore the whale from the ropes and carried it off. This certainly shows that the orcas, together with a very fair share of intelligence, are also creatures of extraordinary courage.—Dundee Advertiser.

Always In Trouble.

A still summer's evening, quiet and peaceful, was the scene nodded sleepily, as if hushing the world to rest. Suddenly the silent beauty was rudely disturbed. The clattering of a horse's hoofs broke the silence into a thousand echoes. A horseman dashed through the scented lanes, rage glittering from his eyes. He sprang from his horse and rushed into the still homestead and dragged forth Farmer Brown.

"Why, what is the matter, Squire Tanpan?" asked the worthy farmer in sleepy surprise.

"Matter!" repeated the squire. "Why, matter enough, to be sure! Your great lubberly son Jack has run off with my beautiful daughter Maud!"

"Has he, really?" cried the farmer, now thoroughly awake. "Thee'rt right it can't 'im a lubberly idjut. He's a'ther doin' somethin' clumsy. Only last week he went an' broke a shovel!"—London Express.

Melting Fire Clay With Sun's Rays.

There is an apparatus which concentrates the rays of the sun from more than 6,000 small mirrors on a spot about seven inches in diameter. The heat generated is about 7,000 degrees F. Iron can be melted in less than a minute and fire clay fused in about three minutes by this machine. Magnesia, one of the hardest things to melt, requiring a heat of about 5,000 degrees F., can be reduced to a molten state in twenty minutes. For the benefit of those who wish to forget the uses of this instrument it is called the pyrheliophor.

Protective Colors of Animals.

I seem to trace a faint clew to the connection between the protective colorings and the mind in the primeval desire of the fox to remain concealed and unseen. That this is a possible clew I infer from the fact that a blind animal does not change color. Put a dozen minnows into an ordinary white wash hand basin and they will in a very short time be of a pale color. If over one no change passes we may be tolerably certain that it is blind.—From Dale's "The Fox."

Guess Again.

"I have a pleasant surprise for you, Miss Sharpiy."

"Can I guess what it is, Mr. Boresome?"

"You may try, Miss Sharpiy."

"Let me see. I guess you are going to tell me that you intended leaving the city."

"Good night, Miss Sharpiy."

"Good night, Mr. Boresome."

Monotonous.

"Wealth has its disadvantages," said the philosopher.

"Yes," answered the man with sporting inclinations. "It must be very monotonous for a man to be able to bet $5,000 or $10,000 on a horse race without caring whether he loses it or not."

Sounded Expensive.

Dumley—How much will it cost to send a packing case from Philadelphia to Boston? Freight Agent—Six cents a foot. Dumley—My! How many feet is it from Philadelphia to Boston?

Habit.

Habit is one of the world's controlling influences. Even men are swayed by force of habit, unconsciously perhaps, than any other motive. The habit of doing certain things in a certain way grows from beginnings so small as to be scarcely noticeable until it has become a chain that can scarcely be broken. The habit of the wrong doing becomes a master, and a more exacting master could not be found.

His Sorrow.

Maud (newly married)—You look very melancholy, George. Are you sorry you married me? George—No, dear, of course not. I was only thinking of all the nice girls I can't marry. Maud—Oh, George, how horrid of you! I thought you were sorry you married me! George—Neither do I. I wasn't thinking of myself, but of the disappointment for them.

Happiness.

Things are so arranged in this world that happiness as a profession must ever be a failure. It cannot be found by seeking it. It is a reflex action. It is incidental, a product which comes from doing noble things. It is impossible for a person to be really happy by making pleasure a profession.

Some of Them Do.

The doctor has been giving a class of youngsters a talk on the care of and how to make them. Presently he said:

"Birds of a feather—do what?"

"Lay eggs," piped a small boy before anybody else had a chance to speak.

A Fares Reformer.

The people of the Faroe islands cling to their old customs and see little good in change, says the author of "The Faroes and Iceland," but now and then one of them becomes a conservative reformer. Such was an old man of Stromo who, in his youth, had learned cabinetmaking in Copenhagen, then had been a shipwright in South Wales and later a marine in the Danish navy during the Slesvick-Holstein war. He returned to Faroe full of the wildest dreams of his countrymen, he returned while still a comparatively young man to Stromo and invested his savings in a home. Conservative though he appeared to outlanders, to the islanders he was a reckless innovator. He roofed his house with slate instead of with the traditional turf, but could find none to follow his example. They shook their heads in doubt. He argued calmly with them against the habit of throwing fish trimmings into the brook and getting drinking water lower down. The only advice they would accept from him—and that after long hesitation—was to boil their fish oil outdoors instead of in the living room. For that when this reckless mariner heard from a visitor that women rode bicycles in England he was so astonished that he asserted confidently that the world could not last much longer.

Cause and Effect.

Shakespeare saw life in large and wrote as he saw. He never "planned it out to finish." His pages are full of the inexorable sequence of cause and effect, and the swift march of deeds points the moral of their inevitable responsibility. If things were "rotten in Denmark," it was because the fathers had eaten sour grapes and children's teeth were set on edge; if Macbeth trembled at the knocking at the gate, it was because conscience doth make cowards of us all. The ghosts that haunted Bosworth field were of Richard's own creating, and Regan and Goneril, desperately dead, reap but their inevitable due. In short, Shakespeare's message is the message of a robust manhood and womanhood: Brace up, pay for what you have, do good if you wish to be good. Good or bad, shoulder the burden of your moral responsibility and never forget that cowardice is the most fatal and most futile crime in the calendar of crimes. Cowards die many times before their deaths.

The valiant never taste of death but once.

—Martha Baker Dunn in Atlantic.

To Cheer Him.

The wife of his bosom was going to leave him for a week or so, and Fitz-Tomkins was trying his very best to look sad.

"My dear," he said, choking back a chuckle with his handkerchief and wiping his eyes, "I hardly like to think how I shall miss you. The long evenings will be so long and lonely without you. I shall have no one to talk to."

"George," said Mrs. Fitz, reproving him with a marble eye, "I have provided for your comfort in this as in your other needs. You will find a warm home you will find dear mother there. She will remain till I come back and keep you company in the evenings, George."

And as the train slowly glided out of the station the grand woodwork of Fitz-Tomkins nearly bit him when he insinuated a tip.—London Telegraph.

No Sinecures In China.

Everybody in China works hard, even those who have reached the highest positions. It is related of a member of the Chinese cabinet that he left home every morning at 4 o'clock, as he was on duty at the palace from 5 to 6. As a member of the privy council he was engaged from 6 to 9. From 9 until 11 he was at the war department, of which he was president. As the member of the board of punishment he was in attendance from 12 till 2, and as a minister of the foreign office he spent every day from 2 till 5 or 6 there. In addition he frequently served on special boards of commissions.

The English of England.

The London Daily Chronicle gives these eccentric pronunciations of a few of the curious place names that dot the map of England: Rhuddlanxton is Ribton, Woodmancote is Uddenmacket, Sawbridgeworth is Saupher, Cherry Hinton is Chinny, Sandiacre is Senjiker, Little Warwick is Lilpsik, Aspatria is Aspitrick, Ruthwell is Trithwell, Llanwyche is Charnage, Happisburgh is Hazeboro, Salt Fleetby is Sollaby, Alnaburgh is Anesbury, Congresbury is Coonsbury.

The Satisfactory Part.

Jamie having come into the possession of considerable wealth through the death of relatives was being addressed by one of his neighbors:

"Aye, Jamie, it was a guid thing for you that your rich freens wanr born afore ye."

"Weel," said Jamie, "I'm nae sae sure about that, for that it was a guid thing that they deed afore me."—Dundee Advertiser.

CATARRH CAN BE CURED.
KILL THE GERMS BY BREATHING HY-O-MEI. GIVES QUICK RELIEF.
Many people who have suffered with catarrh for years naturally regard the disease cannot be cured, and become discouraged.
These failures to get relief is due to the fact that they have not used the right remedy. Catarrh is an affection of the head, throat and lungs and cannot be cured by stomach medicines. It is caused by germs and is contagious. The disease is blood which is breathed through the pocket inhaler so that the medicated air reaches the affected parts, kills all catarrh germs, soothes the mucous membrane, heals the sores, throat and lungs to a healthy condition.
Hy-o-mei does not want anyone to buy it unless they with Hyomei are entirely satisfied. It is sold by druggists under the following guarantee: Your money back if Hyomei does not cure you. Complete outfit, including inhaler, $1.00; extra bottles if you need them, 50c. Sold by druggists throughout the world. Be sure and ask for "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup." and take no other kind. Under the Food and Drugs Act, June 30th, 1906. Serial number 1098.

The "Jolts" and "Jars" of Life are what use people up.

Most people live pretty well up to the limit of their powers, and so long as everything goes smoothly that is apparently all right; but a "jolt" or a "jar" in the shape of business worries, domestic anxieties, or an attack of La Grippe, Pneumonia, Typhoid, or other wasting disease, suddenly reveals the fact that there is a bad lack of reserve force to meet these contingencies and the result is serious, often fatal. A wise man will see to it that his system is fully fortified against sudden attack. To attain this result nothing is so sure and effective as

VESPERS.

The day long have I toiled at oars,
The river broadened as I went,
And now each herb of evening pours
Upon the air its inmost scent.

Fast gathered to their mother bill,
The young plantations of new and dream.
And down the valley bright and still,
Like golden satin, shines the stream;

While red behind their bars of elm
The sunset fires begin to fade,
And tender mists in solemn realm
Are gathering in the glade.

The pastures with a silver shade,

Till presently there comes to me,
For requiem of this good day gone,
The tranquil benedicite
Of twilight bells from Braildon.

So silken clear, so soft and far,
It seems the dusk has scarcely stirred,
While ever the reeds are silver stars
Remains God's last unspoken word.
—London Spectator.

KING'S INDIAN ORDERLIES.

Curious Impressions Formed of the Mother Country.

The King's four Indian orderly officers, who have spent three very crowded months in England, sailed for India recently.

So impressed have been these fine-looking, black-bearded men with the order of things in the mother country that they admit to a certain feeling of envy when speaking of the great sights they have seen.

Londoners have become accustomed during the season now dead and gone to the spectacle of these impassive Orientals in their uniforms of khaki, pale blue, and red and gold; but they scarcely realized perhaps what was passing in their midst.

Last season the Indian orderly officers were Gurkhas, the year before Sikhs. The men who sailed recently were Punjab Mahomedans. They have never tasted alcohol, and their meat must be prepared for them by men of their own faith.

They have all seen much active service, and wear several medals and clasps.

The four officers were taken to the Hippodrome, and before their departure they gave, through an interpreter, some of their impressions to an Express representative.

"There is no ruler in the world like our Padishah-I-Hind"—Emperor of India—"and no Empress like our Empress," said one of the turbaned giants. They never speak of the King and Queen. It is always "our Emperor and Empress."

"We have seen much—the great battleships, the great fair at Woolwich, the Palace of Crystal," said another. "But what can be more wonderful than the order in the street of London? The Londen policeman has but to raise his hand, and great and small do his bidding."

Infantile Mortality.

It is a caustic commentary upon our methods that after more than twenty years of compulsory education it should be left to private initiative to instruct the young mothers of our citizens in the elementary duties of motherhood. The ignorance of working class mothers in the matter of infantile nutrition is phenomenal, a matter the more to be regretted inasmuch as the breast feeding of babies is becoming more extensively less practiced. In this fact, of course, lies the root cause of the whole matter, for dietetical knowledge only becomes necessary so far as regards the immediate life and subsequent health of the infant) when breast feeding is abandoned.

What is the cause of the decline in breast feeding? In the case of the rich it is undoubtedly selfishness on the part of the mother, selfishness and lack of awakened interest. In the case of the poor it is a combination of adverse circumstances, of which the chief are the insufficient nourishment of the mothers and the frequency of married women's employment in factories and the like. This aspect of the problem was trenchantly dealt with by Mr. John Burns in his presidential address to the conference on infantile mortality. Married women's labor, he said, made manufactured lonfers who might be seen buttressing a beershop or French polishing the outside of a public house; married women's labor was an individual luxury, a social misuse, and a commercial blunder. No one who has devoted any time to the study of this subject will hesitate to confirm Mr. Burns' dictum, and it is hoped he will be able, as he desires, to translate his sympathy into action.

In the meanwhile there is an obvious need for some organized effort to instruct young mothers in the vital principles of infant nutrition. This is well done in individual districts by means of visitors and sanitary inspectors, but much remains to be done.—M.F. Burns truly said that nowhere in the world is young motherhood so isolated as in large cities.

A few of these women seek advice at hospitals, but many more blindly in the light of their own ignorance, or upon the pernicious advice of others who, though as ignorant themselves, yet gather from their ripe age a semblance of authority for their vicious doctrines.—London Hospital.

Freak of a Golf Ball.

One has heard of morsels of straw being driven into solid timber by the force of a tornado. Something similar and equally unexplainable was the result of a stroke at golf made by A. Wyndham on the famous Westward Ho course two or three years ago. He found his ball in a bed of bushes, actually impaled upon a rush, so that it was impossible to pick up the ball and hold it suspended upon the rush. That a soft rush which is found to be hard as wood, should be spiked in the ball upon the point of so brittle a thing as a rush is a most remarkable phenomenon.—London Sphere.

Chang Chien, of Chinkiang, has already seven textile, flour mills, rice machine and other factories, says the Shanghai Commercial Intelligence, and he has nineteen new enterprises all with steam and electric equipments, in hand. He is also building his own dock yard.

60 SPECIALISTS ON THE CASE—In the ordinary run of medical practice the greater number treat the same diseased cases of chronic dyspepsia and biliousness, but cure few. Not so with Pineapple Tablets, 60 in a box at 35 cents each. Have made the party feel relief in one day. These little specialists have proven their great merit. —72. Sold by T. B. Wallace.

PEEVISH AND CROSS.

Peevish, cross babies are sick babies — the well baby is always happy. Perhaps there may be nothing to indicate that is the case, but you may depend upon it. Stop that peevishness, banish the fretful one or he would not be cross. Baby's Own Tablets will remove the cause and make baby well and happy. They are a certain cure for all minor ills of babyhood. Thousands of mothers keep them constantly in the house to guard against the sudden illness of baby. Once you have used them baby will keep the little one well. Mrs. James Jewett, Centre Harbor, N.S., says: "I have found Baby's Own Tablets a very good medicine for baby as occasion required since we first got a box. They have always helped her, and now at 2 year and a half she is a fine, healthy child. Baby Tablets, I think, are indispensable for mothers of young children, and in doing so I am only voicing the sentiments of Mrs. Williams, McBride Co., Brockville, Ont."

BURNS—MOARN.

On Wednesday morning, April 17th, a very pretty wedding was solemnized at Cloverdale, when Miss Annie M. Burns, daughter of Mr. Andrew Burns was united in marriage to Mr. James Moarn, Chippewa. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Father Moriarty, who performed the nuptial rites. The bride was prettily attired in a suit and effective gown of white and silver with trimmings of rose insertion and white satin, and carried a white prayer book. Her attendant, Miss Winifred Burns, sister of the bride, looked pretty in a dainty suit of white organdie, and Mr. Thos. Moarn, the groom's brother, performed the duties of groomsman. The reception and dinner given at the home of the bride's parents, was attended only by the immediate relatives. The groom's gift to the bride was a handsome gold bracelet, to the bridesmaid a signet ring, and to the groomsman a set of gold cuff links. Mr. and Mrs. Moarn were the recipients of many beautiful presents, evidencing the high esteem in which they are held.

Greater Napanee's Popular Trading Place.

In calling attention below to some special items we have referred to a tendency to "inflate values" as we might mildly express it. This leads us to state once more in plain terms two cardinal principles of this store. First—To sell reliable merchandise at fair or at a lower price than you can purchase it elsewhere. Second—In giving publicity to this merchandise not to deviate from the absolute truth concerning it.

In times past merchants have professed to believe this second principle impossible. The successful merchant of to-day knows not only that it is possible, but that it is the only foundation upon which to build a permanent, prosperous business. It is our determination that this store shall have always the absolute confidence of the public, and our endeavors are always toward this end.

tor. He was so near to Eve that the slight fragment scent from her clothes might almost have belonged to his own. The impression was confusing, yet vaguely delightful. It was years since he had been so close to a woman of his own class, his own caste. He acknowledged the thought with a curious sense of pleasure. Involuntarily he turned and looked at her.

She was sitting very straight, her fine profile cut clear against the carriage window, her diamonds quivering in the light that flashed by them from the street. For a space the sense of unreality that had pervaded the entrance into Chilcote's life touched him curiously; then another and more potent feeling rose to quell it. Almost involuntarily as he looked at her his lips parted.

"May I say something?" he asked.

Eve remained motionless. She did not turn her head, as most women would have done, "say anything you like," she said grandly.

"Anything?" He bent a little nearer, filled again by the inordinate wish to dominate.

"Of course."

It seemed to him that her voice sounded forced and a little tired. For a moment he looked through the window at the passing lights; then slowly his gaze returned to her face.

"You look very beautiful tonight," he said. His voice was low and his manner unemotional, but his words had the effect he desired.

She turned her head, and her eyes met his in a glance of curiosity and surprise.

Slight as the triumph was, it thrilled him. She realized now with Chilcote's valet came back to him; his own personality moved him again to a reckless determination to make his own voice heard. Leaning forward, he laid his hand lightly on her arm.

"Eve," he said quickly—"Eve, do you remember"—Then he paused and withdrew his hand. The horses had suddenly slowed, then moved altogether as the carriage fell into the Adelaide Bramfell House.

CHAPTER XIV.

Lodder entered Lady Bramfell's feeling far more like an actor than a Bloomsbury man. How d'you do" he said, with doubtful cordiality. The name of Bobby conveyed nothing to him.

To his surprise Eve looked annoyed and Blessington's fresh colored face deepened in tone. With a slow, uncomfortable sensation he was aware of having struck a wrong note.

There was a short, unpleasant pause. Then, more by intuition than actual sight, Blessington saw Eve's eyes turn to him and to Lodder, and with quick tact he saved the situation.

"How d'you do, sir?" he responded, with a smile. "I congratulate you on looking so—so uncommon well. I was just telling Mrs. Chilcote that I hold a commission for Lady Astropp tonight. I'm a sort of scout at present—reporting on the outposts." He spoke fast and without much meaning, but his boyish voice eased the strain.

Eve thanked him with a smile. "Then we mustn't interfere with a person on active service," she said.

"Besides, we have our own duties to get through." She smiled again and, touching Lodder's arm, indicated the reception rooms.

When they entered the larger of the two rooms Lady Bramfell was still receiving her guests. She was a tall and angular woman who, except for a slightly hectic beauty of cheek and feet and a certain similarity of voice, possessed nothing in common with her sister Lilian. She was pushing to a group of people as they approached, and the first sound of her sweet and rather drawling tones touched Lodder with a curious momentary feeling—a vague suggestion of awakened memories. Then the suggestion vanished as she turned and greeted Eve.

"How sweet of you to come!" she murmured. And it seemed to Lodder that a more spontaneous smile lighted up her face. Then she extended her hand to him. "And you, too!" she added. "Though I fear we shall bore you dreadfully."

Watching her with interest, he saw the change of expression as her eyes turned from Eve to him and noticed a colder tone in her voice as she addressed him directly. The observation moved him to self assertion.

"That's a poor compliment to me," he said. "I'm not bored in a society with a polite way of being inane."

Lady Bramfell smiled. "What!" she exclaimed. "You quoting Lady Astropp's social reputation?"

Lodder laughed a little. "The smaller it is the more defending it needs," he replied.

Another stream of arrivals swept by them and he saw Eve smile at their hostess and moved across the room, and he perforce followed. As he gained her side there was a little confusion and Bramfell was left well in the rear, the great throng at the farther end of the room cut off from contact and for the moment they were practically alone.

There was a certain uneasiness in that moment of companionship. It seemed to him that Eve wished to speak, but hesitated. Once or twice she opened and closed the fan that she was carrying, then at last, as if by an effort, she turned and looked at him.

"Why were you so cold to Bobby this evening? I've got to be here to pick up the pieces."

"As you picked up my fans and handkerchiefs last year and the year before?" Eve smiled.

Blessington's face suddenly looked grave. "I wish you hadn't said that," he said. Then he turned abruptly. Out of the hum of talk behind them a man's laugh sounded. It was not loud, but it was a laugh that one seldom hears in a London drawing room. It expressed interest, amusement and in an inexplicable way it seemed also to express strength.

Eve and Bessington both turned instantly. "Who?"

"By Jove!" said Blessington.

Eve said nothing.

Lodder was staring with Lakeley and his was the laugh that had attracted them both. The interest excited by his talk was still reflected in his face and bearing as he made his way toward them.

"By Jove!" said Blessington again. "I never realized that Chilcote was so tall."

Again Eve said nothing. But silently and with a more subtle meaning she found herself echoing the words.

Until he was quite close to her Lodder did not seem to see her. Then he stopped quietly.

"I was speaking to Lakeley," he said. "He wants me to dine with him one night at Cadogan Gardens."

But Eve was silent, waiting for him to address Blessington. She glanced at him quickly, but though their eyes met before he did one such the message that lay in hers. It was a difficult moment. She had known him incredibly, almost supernaturally disentranded, but it had invariably been when he was suffering from nerves, as she phrased it to herself. But tonight he was obviously in the possession of unclouded faculties. She colored slightly and looked under the lashes at Blessington. Had the same idea struck him, she wondered? But he was studiously studying a suit of Chilcote armor that stood close by in a niche of the wall.

"Bobby has been keeping me amused while you talked to Mr. Lakeley," she said pointedly.

Directly addressed, Lodder turned and looked at Blessington. "How d'you do?" he said, with doubtful cordiality. The name of Bobby conveyed nothing to him.

To his surprise Eve looked annoyed and Blessington's fresh colored face deepened in tone. With a slow, uncomfortable sensation he was aware of having struck a wrong note.

There was a short, unpleasant pause. Then, more by intuition than actual sight, Blessington saw Eve's eyes turn to him and to Lodder, and with quick tact he saved the situation.

Her manner was subdued. It was not the annoyed manner that one uses to a man when he has behaved ill; it was the explanatory tone one might adopt toward an incorrigible child. Under her fifth, but the gist of a remark always came to him first, the mode of expression later. The fact that it was Blessington whom he had encountered—Blessington to whom he had spoken with vague politeness—came to him with a sense of unpleasantness. He was not to blame in the matter, nevertheless he blamed himself. He was annoyed that he should have made the slip in Eve's presence.

They were moving forward, nearing the press of people in the second room, when Eve spoke, and the fact filled him with an added sense of annoyance. People smiled and bowed to her from every side; one woman leaned forward as they passed and whispered something in her ear. Again the sensation of futility and vexation filled him; again he realized how pitiable was the plane she held in the world. Then, as his feelings reached their height and speech seemed forced upon him, a small man with a round face, catching a glimpse of Eve, darted from a circle of people gathered in one of the window bays and came quickly toward them. With an instant touch of irritation he recognized Lord Bramfell.

Again the sense of Eve's aloofness stung him as their host approached. In another moment she would be lost to him among this throng of strangers—claimed by them as by right.

"Eve," he said involuntarily and under his breath.

She half paused and turned toward him. "Yes?" she said, and he wondered if it was his imagination that made the word sound silky.

"About that matter of Blessington," he began; then he stopped. Bramfell had reached them.

The little man came up smiling and with an outstretched hand. "There's no penalty for separating husband and wife, is there?" he asked. "Not that you, Chilcote?" He turned from one to the other with the quick, noiseless movements of a well-groomed bird.

Lodder turned aside to hide his vexation, but Eve greeted their host with her usual self possessed smile.

"You are exempt from all penalties tonight," she said. Then she turned to greet the members of his party who had strolled across from the window in his wake.

As she moved aside Bramfell looked at Lodder. "Well, Chilcote, you've dipped into the future yet?" he asked with a laugh.

Lodder echoed the laugh, but said nothing. In his uncertainty at the question he reverted to his old resource of silence.

Bramfell raised his eyebrows. "What!" he said. "Don't tell me that my sister-in-law hasn't engaged you as a victim." Then he turned in Eve's direction. "You've heard of our new departure, Mrs. Chilcote?"

Eve looked round from the lively group by which she was surrounded. "Lilian's crystal gazing? Why, of course!" she said. "She should make a very beautiful seer. We are all quite curious."

Bramfell pursed up his lips. "She has a very beautiful tent at the end of the conservatory. It took five men as many days to rig it up. We could not hear ourselves talk for hammering. My wife said it made her feel quite philosophical; it reminded her so much of a charity bazaar."

Everybody laughed, and at the same moment Blessington came quickly across the room and joined the group.

"Hello!" he said. "Anybody seen Wilkerton? He's next on my list for the crystal business."

Again the whole party laughed, and Bramfell, stepping forward, touched Blessington's arm in mock seriousness.

GOD'S WAY OF JUDGING

OBSCURITY AND TOIL OFTEN THE PRELUDE OF WEALTH.

CHRIST'S METHOD WITH MEN

The World Is Often Indifferent and Neglectful—Keen Struggle the Lot of Some of Its Honored Children—Jesus Chose to Be Obscure—Fickleness of Society—Lessons From the Story of Zaccheus.

Entered according to Act of Parliament of Canada, in the year 1907, by Frederick Dyer, Toronto, at the Dept. of Agriculture, Ottawa.

Los Angeles, Cal., April 28.—That God's way of judging men and choosing them for some special task is totally different from man's way is emphasized in this sermon, the text of which is taken from Luke xix. 5, "To-day I must abide at thy house."

It is amazing how long the world compels some of its most honored children to struggle amid the quicksands of poverty, obscurity, misrepresentation and slander before it allows them to climb the mountain tops of immortality and fame. It is hard to understand why some men have to spend so much of their lives fighting for a mere existence when they would have been able to do so much more good for their fellow men if the world had only been willing to encourage them instead of turning the cold shoulder upon them. Every one remembers the famous couplet by the poet Heywood:

Seven cities warred for Homer being dead,
Who living had no roof to shroud his head.

Well, that is the history of many of the world's greatest heroes and heroines. For years and years they battled with poverty. For years and years they had to fight for mere physical existence. Then came wealth, fame, honor. The world was loosing at their feet to do their bidding.

The lot of the obscure peasant is necessarily hard, yet when Christ was to come into the world it was that lot of obscurity if he desired to know by experience the sorrow and hardship of humanity. Christ for thirty years of his life lived in obscurity and toil. When at last he started forth on his world's mission he was opposed at every step. He was misjudged and slandered. Then there came a sudden change which placed him on the top wave of popularity. We find him so popular in the unknown peasant. All his countrymen are talking of him, and many of them call him a great teacher, etc. His fame, too, has gone abroad, and certain Greeks have asked to see him. He is now on his way to Jerusalem, where he will be acclaimed as the Son of David. He has reached Jericho, and the people turn out to see the young prophet who may prove to be the long expected Messiah.

Who will have the honor of entertaining him? To which home does he go? He can practically go and lodge in any home that he will. Does he go to the home of the gold and silver man? Does he go to the home of the aristocrat? No; he goes to the home of a despised publican. When Christ stops and looks up and sees the despised publican Zaccheus perched up on the overhanging bough of a sycamore tree, he seems to say: "Come, Zaccheus! Come down! Come and let me go home with thee!" Come and let me teach the world that my mission is to save souls which are lost! Come and let me lodge with one who is universally ostracized by his countrymen! Come down, Zaccheus! Come down! For to-day I must abide at thy house!" Now, why did Christ choose to go to Zaccheus' home in preference to all the other homes of Jericho which would gladly have opened their doors to receive with the best honored guest?

Christ lodged in Zaccheus' house in the first place because it was the most despised home in all Jericho. It represented all that was bitter and cruel and tyrannical and unjust. It represented extortion and dishonesty. It represented the fiendish power which would take a community in its vise-like grip and would be hurled against Christ than that he was a friend of publicans and sinners, for of all sinners the worst sinner in Hebrew eyes was the publican. In order to understand why the son of Zaccheus was the most excoriated in all Jericho we must study for a little while the attitude of the Roman government toward its provinces.

The Roman government was like the Turkish government. In the capital of Constantinople sits the "sick man of Europe." He opens the ministry of his kingdom and says: "Here is one of my provinces. I will sell this to the highest bidder. Then I will make the tax collector of this province pay me a certain amount each year. All the moneys he can squeeze out of those people above that amount he can have for himself." So the Sultan sells his provinces, just as a capitalist would sell a farm. Then the tax collector goes to that province, and he puts the financial thumbscrews upon those people.

Such was the province of Judaea in the time of Christ. The Roman government had stationed its tax collectors everywhere. It had sold these provinces and cities to the different buyers. That the Hebrew must bear, but he was humiliated when he saw his own people stooped to thus serve the tyrant. Zaccheus was one of these publicans, with his headquarters at Jericho. He was one of Rome's tax collectors, and as he bled the people until they could be bled no more. And because he was an accredited agent of a legalized robber, the people hated him with an unutterable loathing. They regarded him and his family as social outcasts.

Now, Christ by going to this despised tax collector's house practically said: "Even to the lowest of the low I shall carry my gospel. No man or woman has sunk so deep into the mire of sin but what I can cleanse him from all sin. Zaccheus, I shall take thee and come down, for to-day I must abide with thee." Oh, my friends, is it not a blessed thought to you that Christ came to the publicans and the sinners? Is it not a glorious thought that, no matter how low a man or a woman may be in sin, Jesus is ready and willing to rescue him or her from sin?

Some time ago it was my privilege to attend a revival service held by a well known evangelist. After the talk was over he asked all who would to come forward and confess Christ. They came by scores. There were about a hundred of them. Some were filthy and ragged. Some were without collars. Some of them had their breath reeking with liquor. As they came forward to the mercy seat I kept saying to myself: "I wonder if these men are in earnest. I wonder if these men truly want Christ." Then I set before myself a test. I said: "If they are in earnest Christ will be glad to come to them. He was sincere, too, for he said: 'Blessed are the earnestist.' His name is Melville Trotter.' It is not surprising that the elder's story came to my mind that night, for the man whose pleadings had drawn that dissipated crowd to the mercy seat was the Melville Trotter whose name the elder had on the tip of his tongue. Nor were his invitations to Christ confident. He knew that the Christ who lived in the heart of each one came to him. That is why Trotter went to be a guest at the house of Zaccheus.

I take a step further in my subject and declare that Christ went to the home of Zaccheus for another reason. He wanted to prove to the world that the publican and sinner was not to be swept off their feet by great temptations and suddenly be enlisted on the ranks and lead to the better life. A man born deaf and a robber or even a murderer and a thief may be led to his sins. He may long to become pure and true and to lead a life upright. Zaccheus was a publican, therefore was a dishonest tax collector. But Zaccheus was the one to hear the first salutation of Jesus, was willing to confess that that generous love and welcome the master to his home. That is the way to save a sinner who can be most easily reached by those who are in the present day.

Again, I believe Zaccheus was not at heart an honest man and wanted to be right. Even as he was converted and says to Christ, "Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor, and if I have taken anything from any man by false accusation I restore him fourfold," he gives good evidence that he had primarily been of an honest nature. Then perhaps it was his beauty that led the publican to offer the office of tax collector to him. Perhaps Roman officials came to him and said: "Zaccheus, we would you not like to be the tax collector for this city on earth." I know everybody. You know just how much they are worth. You can make more out of it than anybody else. Oh, no," I think I hear Zaccheus say, "I do not like the office. I am half of my goods I give to the poor, and if I have taken anything from any man by false accusation I restore him fourfold." Then we have good evidence that he had primarily been of an honest nature. Then perhaps it was his beauty that led the publican to offer the office of tax collector to him. Perhaps Roman officials came to him and said: "Zaccheus, we would you not like to be the tax collector for this city on earth." I know everybody. You know just how much they are worth. You can make more out of it than anybody else. Oh, no," I think I hear Zaccheus say, "I do not like the office. I am a true son of Abraham. I drawn him east of Charing Cross, and his first sight of the narrower stream of traffic struck him as garish and unpleasant. As the impression came he accelerated his steps, moved by the wish to make regret and retrospection alike impossible by a contact with actual forces.

Still walking hastily, he entered Clifford's inn, but there almost unconsciously his feet halted. There was something in the quiet immutability of the place that sobered energy, both mental and physical; a sense of changelessness—the changelessness of inanimate things, that rises in such solemn contrast to the variableness of mere human nature, which a new environment, a new outlook, sometimes even a new presence, has power to upheave and remold. He paused, then with slower and steadier steps crossed the little court and mounted the familiar stairs of his own house.

As he turned the handle of his own door some one stirred inside the sitting room. Still under the influence of the stones and trees that he had just left, he moved directly toward the sound and, without waiting for permission, entered the room. After the darkness of the passage it seemed well alight, for, besides the lamp with its green shade, a large fire burned in the grate and helped to dispel the shadows.

As he entered the room Chilcote rose and came forward, his figure thrown into strong relief by the double light. He was dressed in a shabby tweed suit; his face looked pale and set with a slightly nervous tension. But, besides the look and a certain added restlessness of glance, there was no visible change. Reaching Loder, he held out his hand.

"Well?" he said quickly.

The other looked at him questioningly.

"Well? Well? How has it gone?"

"The scheme? Oh, excellently!" Loder's manner was abrupt. Turning from the restless curiosity in Chilcote's eyes, he moved a little way across the room and began to draw off his coat. Then, as if struck by the incivility of the action, he looked back again. "The scheme has gone extraordinarily," he said. "I could almost say absurdly. There are some things, Chilcote, that fairly bowl a man over."

A great relief tinged Chilcote's face. "Good!" he exclaimed. "Tell me all about it."

But Loder was reticent. The moment was unpropitious. It was as if a hungry man had dreamed a great banquet and had awakened to his starvation. He was chary of imparting his visions.

"There's nothing to tell," he said shortly. "All that you want to know is here in black and white. I don't think you'll find I have slipped anything. It's a clear business record." From an inner pocket he drew out a bulky notebook and, recrossing the room, laid it upon the table. It was a correct, even a minute, record of every action that had been accomplished in Chilcote's name. "I don't think you'll find any loose ends," he said as he turned back the pages. "I had you and your position in my mind all through." He paused and glanced up from the book. "You have a position that absolutely insists upon attention," he added in a different voice.

At the new tone Chilcote looked up as well. "No mere lecturer!" he said, with a nervous laugh. "I was anxious to know if you had pulled it off—and you have reassured me. That's enough. I was in a funk this afternoon to know how things were going—one of those sudden, unreasonable funks. But now that I see you"—he cut himself short and laughed once more—"now that I see you, I'm hanged if I don't want to prolong your engagement."

Loder glanced at him, then glanced away. He felt a quick shame at the eagerness that rose at the words—a surprised contempt at this own readiness to anticipate the man's weakness. But almost as speedily as he had turned away he looked back again.

"Tush, man!" he said, with his old intolerant manner. "You're dreaming. You've had your holiday, and school's begun again. You must remember you are dining with the Charringtons tonight. Young Cherrington's coming of age—quite a big business. Come along. I want my clothes." He laughed and, moving closer to Chilcote, slapped him on the shoulder.

Chilcote started; then, suddenly becoming imbued with the other's manner, he echoed the laugh.

"By Jove," he said, "you're right! You're quite right. A man must keep his feet in their own grooves." Raising his hand, he began to fumble with his tie.

But Loder kept the same position. "You'll find the check book in its usual drawer," he said. "I've made one entry of £100, pay for the first week. The rest can stand over until"— He paused abruptly.

Chilcote shifted his position. "Don't talk about that. It upsets me to anticipate. I can make out a check tomorrow payable to John Loder."

"No. That can wait. The name of Loder is better out of the book. We can't be too careful." Loder spoke with unusual impetuosity. Already a slight, unreasonable jealousy was coloring his attitude. Already he grudged the idea of Chilcote with his unstable glance and restless fingers opening the drawers and inscribing the name that for one stupendous fortnight had been his without question. Turning aside, he changed the subject abruptly.

"Come into the bedroom," he said. "It's half past 7 if it's a minute, and the Charrington's show is at 9." Without waiting for a reply, he walked across the room and held the door open.

There was no silence while they exchanged clothes. Loder talked continuously, sometimes in short, curt sentences, sometimes with ironic touches of humor; he talked until Chilcote, strangely affected by contact with the other personality after his weeks of solitude, fell under his influence, his excitement rising at his imagination springing at the novelty of change. At last, garbed once more in the clothes of his own world, he passed from the bed room back into the sitting room and there halted, waiting for his companion.

Almost directly Loder followed. He came into the room quietly and, moving at once to the table, picked up the notebook.

"I'm not going to preach," he began, "so you needn't shut me up. But I'll say just one thing—a thing that will be useful. Try to keep your hold! Remember your responsibilities and keep your hold!" He spoke energetically, looking earnestly into Chilcote's eyes. He did not realize it, but he was pleading for his own career.

Chilcote paled a little, as he always did in face of a reality. Then he extended his hand.

"My dear fellow," he said, with a touch of hauteur, "a man can generally be trusted to look after his own life."

Extracting his hand almost immediately, he turned toward the door and without a word of farewell passed into the little hall, leaving Loder alone in the sitting room.

CHAPTER XII.

ON the night of Chilcote's return to his own Loder tasted the lees of life poignantly for the first time. Before their curious compact had been entered upon he had been, if not content, at least apathetic; but with action the apathy had been dispersed, never again to regain its old position.

He realized with bitter certainty that his was no real home coming. On entering Chilcote's house he had experienced none of the unfamiliarity, none of the unsettled awkwardness, that assailed him now. There he had almost seemed the exile returning after many hardships; here, in the atmosphere made common by years, he felt by wheels and hoofs, by the noise of the solitude of night that sits so ill on the strenuous city street was making itself felt, though the throngs of people on the pathway still streamed eastward and westward, and the taverns made a busy trade.

Having crossed the roadway, Loder paused for a moment to survey the scene. But human life in the abstract made small appeal to him, and his glance wandered from the passersby to the buildings massed like clouds against the dark sky. As his gaze moved slowly from one to the other a block near at hand struck 7, and an instant later the chorus was taken up by a dozen clamorous tongues. Usually he scarcely heard and never heeded these innumerable chimes, but this evening their effect was strange. Coming out of the darkness, they seemed to possess a personal note, a human declaration. The impression was fantastic, but it was strong. With a species of revolt against it and his own personality, he turned slowly and moved forward in the direction of Lodgate hill.

For a space he continued his course, then, reaching Bouverie street, he turned sharply to the right and made his way down the slight incline that leads to the embankment. There he paused and drew a long breath. The sense of space and darkness soothed him. Pulling his cap over his eyes, he crossed to the river and walked on in the direction of Westminster bridge.

As he walked the great mass of water by his side looked dark and smooth as oil with its sweeping width and network of reflected light. On its farther bank rose the tall buildings, the chimneys, the flaring lights that suggested life and and an alien London. Close at hand stretched the solid stone parapet, giving assurance of protection.

All these things he saw with his mental eyes, but with his mental eyes only, for his physical gaze was fixed about where the houses of parliament loomed out of the dusk. From the great buildings his eyes never wavered until the embankment was traversed and Westminster bridge reached. Then he paused, resting his arms on the coping of the bridge.

In the tense quietude of the darkness the place looked vast and inspiring. The shadowy terrace, the silent river, the rows of lighted windows, each was significant, slowly and comprehensively his glance passed from one to the other. He was no sentimentalist and no dreamer. But he was simply the act of a man whose interests, outside of their natural outlet, turn instinctively toward the life and symbols of the work that is denied them. His scrutiny was steady—even cold. He was raised to a realization by the vastness of the building, not awed or chilled by any dawning of himself. He looked at it long and thoughtfully; then, again moving slowly, he turned and retraced his steps.

His mind was full as he walked back, still oblivious of the stone parapet on the embankment, the bare trees and the flaring lights of the advertisements across the water. Turning to the left, he regained Fleet street and made his way down Chancery lane with the quiet accuracy that some men exhibit in moments of absorption.

He crossed Clifford's inn with the same slow, almost listless, step; then, as his own doorway came into his vision, paused. Some one was standing in its recess.

For a moment he wondered if his nerves were playing him a trick. Then his reason sprang to certainty with so fierce a leap that for an instant his heart receded. For we more often stand aghast at the strength of our own feelings than before the enormity of our unfledged actions.

"Is that you, Chilcote?" he said below his breath.

At the sound of his voice the other wheeled round. "Hello!" he said. "I thought you were the ghost of some old inhabitant. I suppose I am very unexpected?"

Loder took the hand that he extended and pressed the fingers unconsciously. The sight of this man was like the finding of an oasis at the point where the desert is sandiest, deadliest, most unbearable.

"Yes, you are—unexpected," he answered. ...

Chilcote looked at him, then looked out into the court. "I'm done up," he said. "I'm right at the end of my tether." He laughed—as he said it, but in the dim light of the hall Loder thought his face looked ill and harassed despite the flush that the excitement of the meeting had brought to it. Taking his arm, he drew him toward the stairs.

"So the rope has run out, eh?" he said, in imitation of the other's tone. But under the guise of the manner his own nerves were throbbing with the peculiar alertness of anticipation, a sudden sense of mastery over life that lifted him above surroundings and above persons—a sense of stature, mental and physical, from which he surveyed the world. He felt as if fate in the moment of utter darkness had given him a sign.

As they crossed the hall Chilcote had drawn away and was already mounting the stairs. And as Loder followed it came sharply to his mind that here, in the slipshod freedom of a first outward avowal, but acknowledged by the inward, keener sense that manifests the individual.

In silence they ascended the stairs, but on the first landing Chilcote paused and looked back, surveying Loder from the superior height of two steps.

"I did very well at first," he said. "I did very well. I almost followed your example for a week or so. I found myself on a sort of pinnacle, and I clung on. But is the last ten days I've—I've rather lapsed."

"Why?" Loder scolded looking at his face. His kept his glance fixed determinedly on the spot where his own hand gripped the banister.

"Why?" Chilcote repeated. "Oh, the prehistoric tale—weakness stronger than strength. "I'm—I'm sorry to come down on you like this, but it's the social side that bowls me over. It's the social side I can't stick."

"The social side? But I thought"—

"Don't think. I never think; it entails such a constant upsetting of principles and theories. We are strange for business only, but one can't set up barriers. Society pushes itself everywhere nowadays, into business most of all. I don't want you for theater parties or dinners. But a big reception with a political flavor is different. A man has to be seen at these things. He needn't say anything or do anything, but it's bad form if he fails to show up."

Loder raised his head. "You must explain," he said abruptly.

Chilcote started slightly at the sudden demand.

"I—I suppose I'm rather irrelevant," he said quickly. "Fact is, there's a reception at the Brandells' tonight. You know Blanche Brandell—Viscountess Bramfell, sister to Lillian Astrupp." His words conveyed nothing to Loder, but he did not consider that. All ceremonies were strange to him and he invariably chafed to be done with them.

"And you've got to put in an appearance—for party reasons?" Loder broke in.

Chilcote showed relief. "Yes. Old Frank makes rather a point of it—so does Eva." He said the last words carelessly; then as if their sound recalled something, his expression changed. A touch of satirical amusement touched his lips and he laughed.

"By the way, Loder," he said, "my wife was actually tolerant of me for nine or ten days after my return. I thought your representation was to be quite impersonal? I'm not jealous," he laughed, "I'm not jealous, I assure you; but the turned child shouldn't grow absentminded."

At his tone and his laugh Loder's blood stirred. With a sudden, unexpected impulse his hand tightened on the banister, and, looking up, he caught sight of the face above him—his own face it seemed, alighted with malicious intrigue. At the sight a strange sensation of actual life, his grip on the banister loosened, and, pushing past Chilcote, he hurriedly mounted the stairs.

Outside his own door the other overtook him.

"Loder!" he said. "Loder! I meant no harm. A man must have a laugh sometimes."

But Loder was facing the door and did not turn round.

A sudden fear shook Chilcote. "Loder!" he exclaimed again. "You would not desert me? I can't go back tonight. I can't go back."

Still Loder remained immovable.

Alarmed by his silence, Chilcote stepped closer to him.

"Loder! Loder, you won't desert me?" He caught hastily at his arm.

With a quick repulsion Loder shook him off, then almost as quickly he turned round.

"What fools we all are" he said abruptly. "We only differ in degree. Come in and let us change our clothes."

CHAPTER XIII.

THE best moments of a man's life are the moments when, strong in himself, he feels that the world lies before him. Gratified ambition may be the summer, but anticipation is the ardent springtime of a man's career.

As Loder drove that night from Fleet street to Grosvenor square he realized this, though scarcely with any degree of consciousness, for he was no accomplished self analyst. But in a wave of feeling too vigorous to be denied he recognized his regained foothold—the step that lifted him at once from the pit to the pinnacle.

In that moment of realization he looked neither backward nor forward. The present was all sufficing. Difficulties might loom ahead, but difficulties had but one object—the testing and sharpening of a man's strength. In the first deep surge of ego-istical feeling he almost rejoiced in the grain of individual satisfaction. Then very quietly he opened the door and crossed the hall.

As he entered, a footman was arranging the fire that burned in the big grate. Seeing the man, he halted.

"Where is your mistress?" he asked in unconscious repetition of his first question in the same house.

The man looked up. "She has just finished dinner, sir. She dined alone in her own room." He glanced at Loder in the quick, uncertain way that was noticeable in all the servants of the household when they addressed their master. Loder saw the look and wondered what depth of curiosity it betrayed, how much of insight into the domestic life that he must always be content to skim. For an instant the old resentment against Chilcote tinged his exaltation, but he swept it angrily aside. Without further remark he began to mount the stairs.

Gaining the landing, he did not turn, as usual, to the door that shut off Chilcote's rooms, but moved onward down the corridor toward Ewe's private sitting room. He moved slowly till the door was reached. Then he paused and lifted his hand. There was a moment's wait while his fingers rested on the handle; then a sensation he could not explain, a reverence, a reluctance to intrude upon this one precinct, caused his fingers to relax. With a slightly embarrassed gesture he drew back slowly and returned his steps.

Once in Chilcote's bedroom, he walked to the nearest bell and pressed it. Renwick had responded, and at sight of him Loder's feelings warmed with the same sense of fitness and familiarity that the great bed and somber furniture of the room had inspired.

But the man did not come forward as he had expected. He remained close to the door with a hesitation that was unusual in a trained servant. It struck Loder that possibly his solidity had exasperated Chilcote and that possibly Chilcote had been at no pains to conceal the exasperation. The idea caused him to smile involuntarily.

"Come into the room, Renwick," he said. "It's uncomfortable to see you standing there. I want to know if Mrs. Chilcote has sent me any message about tonight."

Renwick studied him furtively as he came forward. "Yes, sir," he said. "Mrs. Chilcote's maid said that the carriage was ordered for 10:15, and she hoped that would suit you." He spoke mechanically, as if expecting a rebuke.

At the opening sentences Loder had turned aside, but now, as the man finished, he wheeled round again and looked at him closely with his keen, observant eyes.

"Look here," he said. "I can't have you speak to me like that. I was put down on you rather sharply when my—my nerves are bad, but when I'm myself I can't stand it. I trust you decently at any rate. You'll have to learn to discriminate. Look at me now?" A thrill of rest and of rebounding passed through him as he spoke. "Look at me now! Do I look as I looked this morning—or yesterday?"

The man eyed him half-stupidly, half timidly.

"Well?" Loder insisted.

"Well, sir," Renwick responded with some shyness, "you look the same and you look different—a healthier color, perhaps, sir, and the eye clearer." He grew more confident under Loder's half amusement, half impatient gaze. "Now that I look closer, sir"—

Loder laughed. "That's it!" he said. "Now that you look closer. You'll have to grow observant. Observation is an excellent quality in a servant. When you come into a room in future, look first of all to me and take your cue from that. Remember that serving a man with nerves is like serving two masters. Now you can go, and tell Mrs. Chilcote's maid that I shall be quite ready at a quarter past 10."

"Yes, sir. And after that?"

"Nothing further. I shan't want you again tonight." He turned away as he spoke and moved toward the great fire that was always kept alight in Chilcote's room. But as the man moved toward the door he wheeled back again. "Oh, one thing more, Renwick! Bring me some sandwiches and a whisky." He remembered for the first time that he had eaten nothing since early afternoon.

A few minutes after 10 Loder left Chilcote's room, resolutely descended the stairs and took up his position in the hall. Resolution is a strong word to apply to such a proceeding, but something in his bearing, in the attitude of his shoulders and head, instinctively suggested it.

Five or six minutes passed, but he waited without impatience. Then at last the sound of a carriage stopping before the house caused him to lift his head, and at the same instant Eve appeared at the head of the staircase.

She stood there for a second, looking down on him, her mind a pace or two behind holding her cloak. The picture she made struck upon his mind with something of a revelation.

On his first sight of her she had appealed to him as a strange blending of youth and self possession—a girl with a woman's experience of life. Later he had been drawn to study her in other respects—as a possible comrade and friend. Now for the first time he saw her as a power in her own world—a woman to whom no man could deny consideration. She looked taller for the distance between them, and the distinction of her carriage added to the effect. Her black gown was exquisitely soft—as soft as her black hair. Above her forehead was a cluster of splendid diamonds shaped like a coronet, and a band of the same stones encircled her neck. Loder realized in a glance that only the most distinguished of women could wear such ornaments and not have her beauty eclipsed. With a touch of the old awkwardness that had before assailed him in her presence, he came slowly forward as she descended the stairs.

"Can I help you with your cloak?" he asked, and as he asked it something like surprise at his own timidity crossed his mind.

For a second Eve's glance rested on his face. Her expression was quite impassive, but as she lowered her lashes a faint gleam flickered across her eyes. Nevertheless, her answer, when it came, was studiously courteous.

"Thank you," she said, "but Marie will do all I want."

Loder looked at her for a moment, then turned aside. He was not hurt by his rebuff. Rather, by an interesting sequence of impressions, he was stirred by it. The pride that had refused Chilcote's help, and the self control that had refused it graciously, moved him to admiration. He understood and appreciated both by the light of personal experience.

"The carriage is waiting, sir," Crapham's voice broke in.

Loder nodded, and Eve turned to her maid. "That will do, Marie," she said. "I shall want a cup of chocolate when I get back; probably at 1 o'clock." She drew her cloak about her shoulders and moved toward the door. Then she paused and looked back. "Shall we start?" she asked quietly.

Loder, still watching her, came forward at once. "Certainly," he said, with unusual gentleness.

He followed her as she crossed the footpath, but made no further offer of help, and when the moment came he quietly took his place beside her in the carriage. His last impression, as the horses wheeled round was of the open hall door—Crapham in his somber livery and the maid in her black dress, both silhouetted against the dark background of the hall; then as the carriage moved forward smoothly and rapidly he leaned back in his seat and closed his eyes.

During the first few moments of the drive there was silence. To Loder there was a strange, new sensation in this companionship, so close and yet so dis-

"You would not desert me?" ever become intimately close. He had used the place for years, but he had used it as he might use a hotel, and whatever of the household gods had come with him remained, like himself, on sufferance. His entrance into Chilcote's surroundings had been altogether different. Unknown to himself, he had been in the position of a young artist who, before modeling his clay, is brought into the studio of a sculptor. To his outward vision everything is new, but his inner sight leaps to instant understanding. Amid all the strangeness he recognizes the one essential—the workshop, the atmosphere, the home.

On this first night of return Loder comprehended something of this position, and, comprehending, he faced the problem and fought with it.

He had made his bargain and must pay his share. Weighing this, he had looked about his room with a quiet gaze. Then at last, as if finding the object really sought for, his eyes had come round to the mantelpiece and rested on the clock. The gold face stood precisely as he had left them. He had looked at them for a long time, then an ironic expression had been almost a smile had touched his lips, and, crossing the room, he had taken the oldest and slackest from its place and slowly filled it with tobacco.

With the first indrawn breath of smoke his attitude had changed, without conscious determination he had chosen the one factor capable of easing his mood. A cerebral brought to the trivial moments of life; a cigar for its fulfillments, its pleasant, comfortable retrospections; but with the capacity for the solving of question, the fighting of difficulty—a pipe is man's eternal friend.

So he had passed the first night of his return to the actualities of life. His mind, when the pipe was almost settled, and outward aid was not so essential; but, though facts faced him more solidly, they were nevertheless very drab in shade. The necessity for work, that blessed antidote to ennui, no longer forced him to endeavor. He was no longer penniless, but the money he possessed brought with it no desires. When a man has lived from hand to mouth for years and suddenly finds himself with £100 in his pocket the result is sometimes curious. He finds with a vague sense of surprise that he has forgotten how to spend. That extravagance, like other artificial passions, requires cultivation.

This he realized even more fully on the days that followed the night of his short return, and even it was born a new bitterness. The man who has friends and no money may find life difficult, but the man who has money and no friend to rejoice in his fortune or benefit by his generosity is aloof indeed. With the leaven of incredulity that works in all strong natures, Loder distrusted the professional beggar; therefore the charity that bestows easily and promiscuously was denied him, and of other channels of generosity he was too self contained to have learned the secret.

When depression falls upon a man of usually even temperament it descends with a double weight. The natural outlet one has a hundred comfortableizing devices to rid itself of gloom—a sudden lifting of spirit, a buoyancy of other moods freed through, other blackness dispersed by time but the man of level nature has none of these. Depression when it comes is indeed depression; no phase of mind to be superseded by another phase, but a stain-ing of all the chords of life.

It was through such a depression as this that he labored during three weeks, while no summons and no hint of remembrance came from Chilcote. His position was peculiarly difficult. He found no action in the present, and toward the future he dared not trust himself to look. He had slipped the old moorings that familiarity had rendered endurable, but, having slipped them, he had found no substitute. Such was the dreary twilight of the three weeks and such his frame of mind as he crossed Fleet street from Chilford's inn to Middle Temple lane.

It was scarcely 7 o'clock, but already the dusk was falling. The greater press of vehicles had ceased, and the light of the street lamps gleamed back from the spaces of dry and polished roadway, worn smooth as a mirror by wheels and hoofs. Instead of the solitude of night that sits so ill on the strenuous city street was making itself felt, though the throngs of people on the pathway still streamed eastward and westward, and the taverns made a busy trade.

Having crossed the roadway, Loder paused for a moment to survey the scene. But human life in the abstract made small appeal to him, and his glance wandered from the passersby to the buildings massed like clouds against the dark sky. EVERLASTING SHAVING COMFORT

Will Last a Lifetime.

CARBO MAGNETIC RAZORS have revolutionized razor making—they are TEMPERED BY ELECTRICITY, which is OUR OWN EXCLUSIVE SECRET PROCESS—the steel used in their manufacture is of the finest English and Swedish make. This wonderful discovery is the result of years of experiment and study, and at last there has been produced a razor that will shave any beard, NO MATTER HOW TOUGH.

ELECTRIC TEMPERING adds CARBON to the steel; whereas tempering by fire, (the only other method known for centuries) DESTROYS the CARBON which is the life of steel. All other makes of razors must be HONED AND GROUND often, as their blades will NOT hold an edge any length of time. CARBO MAGNETIC RAZORS do not require HONING or GRINDING during a lifetime in private use; they are all tempered alike, every part of their blades being subjected to the same AMPERES OF ELECTRICITY. CARBO MAGNETIC RAZORS are ground FIVE times by the HAMBURG METHOD, the most expensive grinding known.

YOUR DEALER will deliver to you one of these CARBO MAGNETIC RAZORS on 30 days' trial, without obligation on your part to purchase—take advantage of this opportunity. Break away from the barber habit! You will save $50 00 annually.

Call on our representatives in your town, and request a copy of "Hints On Shaving"—This booklet illustrates the correct razor position for shaving every part of the face (ACTUAL PHOTOGRAPHS TAKEN FROM LIFE)—it also tells you HOW TO STROP A RAZOR PROPERLY; should our dealer be out of them, drop us a card, and we will send you one by return mail.

Dr. Hugo's Health Tablets for Women Make Healthy Women

You have No Reason for Not Using Zutoo

Some people think that all headache cures are alike—that they all undermine the health, even if not perceived at the time of taking them.

Well, we'll admit that the drug cures do this, but there is no reason why you should not take Zutoo.

Zutoo is a harmless vegetable remedy. One ingredient is soda—just old-fashioned soda that our grandmothers used to take to settle the stomach, when they had sick headache. And there is nothing better.

The principal ingredient—the one that stops the headache, is a vegetable ingredient, imported for us from Japan. It wont hurt you any more than will the soda.

There is absolutely no reason why you should not use Zutoo.

If you suffer from headache there is every reason why you should.

Take an it into the bed and it was off a headache. Taken later, they will stop it in twenty minutes, and leave you feeling good every title.

If you are using a drug remedy, why not discard it?

Zutoo will cure just as quickly and will save you the penalty, that all must sometime pay, who take the drugs which these cures contain.

If you will give Zutoo one trial, you will never take any other headache remedy again.

New York Letter.

New York City,
130 W. 57th St.

Dear Beaver,—It never rains but it pours," is the old story, and how true the adage. Here I am crowding on The Beaver with two letters a week, but you must excuse me, for I am seeing so much that I have to get rid of it to give room for more. The largest and greatest of news papers in New York City is the New York Journal, of late has the greatest circulation. I was shown all through it yesterday. It has a circulation of 800,000 copies daily, and the Sunday circulation in the city is half a million copies, in fact they claim the greatest circulation of any newspaper in the world. The presses are mechanical monsters, rolls of paper are put in the press at a time, and weigh half a ton each. When the press begins to print this paper goes through it at a rate like a train through a threshing machine, and the papers come through folded at the rate of 500 copies per minute. Each roll of paper produces one thousand six-page papers.

I managed to get into the Tombs yesterday, and we. They, although my old friend, Mr. Brent Good. It was a difficult thing to do, but it was told before the attempt was made that if any man in New York could get me through it was Brent Good, and he did, and although you would up before Judge Mc. I will write The Beaver anything about the dirty, boot-graced gorilla, I am seriously looking upon your request merely show the public that I have been has, for the purpose of feeding its his countenance, of the inward spirit of the man. He is in my mind's eye and conceal, and the act he committed has losing the worst of all crimes—that letting a degenerate cannot control his animal passions and jealousy is the master of him. I was in the Tombs Hotel, where his wife and the Thaw family board, and they are their meals daily. This hotel is just across the street from the Criminal restaurant, on the corner of Fifth Avenue and 6th streets. So also is the restaurant Sherry on the south is a market corner of Fifth Ave. and 45th streets, which everybody has heard so much about. I also visited the St. Regis Hotel on Fifth Ave., amongst the Vanderbilts and other millionaires and a room in this house costs $125 per day with board extra. Near here is Madison square Roof Garden, where Stanford White was killed by Thaw, which I also saw.

The Tiffany Jewelry Store is quite near, also on Fifth Ave. The house is St. Regis, in the world. I was shown a diamond as large as a hickory nut with the label on it, and was told that its value was $100,000. I was also shown a gentleman's ring worth $11700. In fact there are millions of dollars worth of diamonds in this store. Some rings that cost $3,000, and it is nothing but something like a fine gold ring, and diamonds in New York City.

The Tiffany Jewelry Store is a white marble structure of four stories, on Fifth Ave. On the first floor are the gold and silver plated goods and on the second silver plated, the precious designs in the world. This firm has branches in Berlin, London, and Paris, all of the same dimensions. There is no bogus, plated or rolled stuff kept whatever. So Mr. Editor, if you want to make your wife a present of a nice ring, brooch or an ornament to adorn her hair, come to New York and purchase here in this Tiffany store, and you will get what you ask for.

On Broadway as it is called, is built upon as the old turn pike road run out from the harbor of the ships in New York's early days, of the settlement of American. Hence its first name that ran parallel with other streets, as it is something like our York road, goes cutting across other streets. Fifth Ave. is the gay street of New York, for fashionable ladies, horseless, automobiles and carriages with fine horses, crowded to its utmost, all the time, and it is here one sees the diamonds flickering on the people's fingers, breasts and in the ladies' hats.

Yesterday, Mr. Good, Mr. Williamson, a new acquaintance formed at the Tombs, went over the East River by ferry boat, with a 40-horse power auto car into Long Island, and ran out in the country 33 miles. Long Island is 100 miles long by 20 wide in the widest place, and is the prettiest country, with the best roads that I ever saw. There are no barns or fences, the residents keeping no stock or raising no grain, do not require fodder or barns. But don't they have lovely houses, and trees though. They may be like the most of us, careless sometimes, but their inward spirit shows a pride for some one particular thing, and with them it is their houses and lawns and good roads at least. There are three railroads running through the island lengthwise, and the island has many towns and villages scattered through it; in fact, the whole island is spotted thickly with nice houses. Truck farming being their line, the land is rich and mostly level with hedges about their lawns.

Horrible! Horrible! Horrible!

The suffering of dyspeptics cannot be understood by those who enjoy perfect digestion. It is the person who suffers from this horrible disease who knows what continual suffering it is. It is really tormenting to look upon a tempting dinner, and realize that to eat freely means distress and suffering. Let such a one try how they can enjoy eating, go that the heartiest meals will set well and cause no pain, distress or uncomfortable feeling. Of Full'rs Ma. TRY THEM AND BE CURED

The people are wealthy and do not have to sell out, being contented, and well they might be.

I attended another Episcopalian church on Sunday, and a Bishop preached the sermon, and it was the best that I have heard for years. I have been to three other, clubs since writing, and here is where you will find the finest of men, being well selected or a fred out of the many, makes them to appear a fine race of men.

Yesterday I saw a bold advertisement on the side of a building, "Old Over Bolt" whiskey. The man that takes a bolt is wreathe him to meet her what bolt he gives you, overcoat, underbelt, or rough and tumble he will throw you every time. So if you ever come to New York don't take a bolt of old overbolt whiskey.

The weather is getting pretty hot here, and Mr. Good is soon to leave for Long Branch, N.Y., for his summer residence. I shall leave soon for the west myself, off at Watertown a little while, and then back to my old trade again.

A GRAND CONCERT.

The Ladies' Choral Club concert in the Opera House last Thursday night was certainly a musical treat. The hall was filled to its almost capacity, and everyone present seemed delighted. Mr. Arthur Blight is singing his presidential way by many the best voice ever heard in Napanee. The choruses, quartettes and solos by local talent were all well rendered, and heartily applauded. The instrumental music of Mrs. Harold Wilson, Mrs. Henry, Miss L. Hall and Miss Bessie Hall was also highly creditable, as was the readings of Mrs. F. E. VanLaven, the directress, for her skill and painstaking in training her choruses to such perfection.

DESERONTO WEDDING.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Owens, Thomas st., Deseronto, was the scene of great festivity on Wednesday, May 1st, when their daughter, Miss Lottie Borden, of Toronto, was united in holy matrimony to Horace B. Dilks, of Toronto. The ceremony was performed by Rev. E. Costigan, St. Mark's church, in the presence of a large number of guests, at 11 o'clock noon. The bride looked lovely attired in a beautiful white silk dress with over dress of organdie, and carried a shower bouquet. She was attended by Miss Levens, of Picton, who looked charming in white muslin dress and white hat. The groom was attended by Mr. Armstrong, of Toronto. The bridal presents were numerous and very beautiful. The groom's present to the bride being a beautiful diamond and ruby bracelet, and to the bridesmaid a pearl ring. Guests were present from Toronto, Picton, Bloomfield, Deseronto and Napanee. After a bountiful luncheon was served, the happy couple left on the afternoon train for a trip to New York and other American cities. On their return they will reside in Toronto. Their many friends join in wishing them a happy and prosperous journey through life.

STORMY MAY, SAYS HICKS.

The weather prognostications for May as outlined by Rev. Irl R. Hicks predict the probability of many and heavy storms. This, he says, applies at to all sections of the country. We may expect rain, wind and thunder storms from the 1st the 3rd. From that date to the 6th there is to be unseasonable cold in extreme northern sections, with possible sleet and snow, causing a cool wave over most parts of the country. Along about the 9th we are told to expect high temperature and thunderstorms. Sunday, Monday and Tuesday, the 12th, 13th and 14th, are named as dates of severe storm disturbances, with warm, humid atmosphere, low barometer and southerly winds. About the 20th a probable cycle of rain, wind and thunderstorms may make things uninteresting. The outlook for Victoria Day, May 24th, is not very encouraging for Canadians, presaging "probable danger" and destructive hail storms, with sudden revulsion from extreme warmth to unseasonable cold.

MAY CANADIAN MAGAZINE.

Credit is certainly due Canadian Magazine for bringing to the attention of students of Canadian literature the writings of the early pioneers of some of the early Victorian poets, particularly Susanna Moodie and Wordsworth. The May number contains an article on Mrs. Moodie, entitled "The Heroic Heritage of Genius," in which it is claimed that Mrs. Moodie's writings entitle her to the mention of the author of a tablet to the memory of the poet laureate. Wordsworth's "Daffodils" is quoted, and the difference between the letters on the Moodie and those on the Wordsworth tablet is striking and decided. Interesting, too, is the article on Archibald Lampman, a well-illustrated article and five or six original short stories.

Already some of our American subscribers have forwarded the necessary postage to make up the difference, others, whose year has just expired, have sent $1.50 for one or other year; others, who are paid in advance, have asked us to deduct the amount from their already paid subscription sufficient to allow for the postage for the unexpired term. Those who have not so responded, who are in arrears, will not receive The Beaver until such arrears are paid. In future all papers sent to the United States will have to be paid in advance. The rate to all Canadian subscribers is the same as before, $1.00 a year.

FARMERS' EXCHANGE.

Pentieton Gazette, B.C.

A. E. Bennett, of Parkland, has been engaged as manager for the Penticton Farmers' Exchange, his duties to commence on the 1st June. Mr. Bennett's first work will be to secure subscribers to the remaining stock of the Exchange and make arrangements for the installation of a cominge plant. The capital stock of the Exchange will be raised to meet the requirements of the undertaking, and the cannery will be in operation during the canning fruit season. It has been suggested that the name of the Penticton Farmers' Exchange be changed to the Penticton Fruit Growers' Exchange. This would doubtless be more appropriate, as Penticton is essentially a fruit-growing district. Mr. Bennett has had a number of years' experience in the fruit business, as well as a practical experience in banking, and his engagement is the guarantee that the same will be carried on in a thoroughly satisfactory manner.

Mr. Bennett's Napanee friends will be pleased to learn of his success.—Ed.

GOT HIS HAIR BACK.

Was Perfectly Bald When He Started to Use Newbro's Herpicide.

Frederick Mansell, Marylan' block, Butte, Montana, bought a bottle of Newbro's Herpicide, April 6, '06, and began to use it for entire baldness. The hair follicles in his scalp were not dead and in 30 days he had hair all over his head. On July 2 he writes, "and today my hair is as thick and luxuriant as any one could wish." Newbro's Herpicide works in an old principle and with a new discovery—stirs the cause and you receive the effect. Herpicide destroys the germ that causes dandruff, falling hair, and finally baldness, so that with the cause gone the effect cannot remain. Destroy the cause and a new growth starts. Sold by leading druggists, or send 10c in stamps for sample to The Herpicide Co., Detroit, Mich.

THE MASQUERADER

By Katherine Cecil Thurston, author of "The Circles," Etc.

"Witcheston is playing bridge, like a sensible man," he said. "Leave him in peace, Bobby."

Blessington made a comical grimace. "But I'm working this on commercial principles," he said. "I keep the list, names and hours complete, and Lady Astrupp gazes in blissful ignorance as to who her victims are. The whole thing is great, simple and statistical."

"For goodness' sake, Bobby, shut up!" Bramfell's round eyes were twinkling with amusement.

"But my system"—

"System! Ah, we all had them when we were as young as you are!"

"And they all had flaws, Bobby," Eve broke in. "We were always finding gaps that had to be filled up. Never mind about Lord Witchestoh. Get a substitute. It won't count if Lillian doesn't know."

Blessington wavered as she spoke. His eyes wandered round the party and again rested on Bramfell.

"Not me, Bobby! Remember, I've brevetted crystals—prudently freed on them—for the last week. Now, there's Chilcote"— Again his eyes twinkled.

All eyes were turned on Loder, though one or two strayed surreptitiously to Eve. She, seeming sensitive to the position, laughed quickly.

"A very good idea!" she said. "Who wants to see the future if not a politician?"

Loder glanced from her to Blessington. Then, with a very feminine impulse, she settled the matter beyond dispute.

"Please use your authority, Bobby," she said. "And when you've got him safely under canvas come back to me. It's years since we've had a talk." She nodded and smiled, then instantly turned to Bramfell with some trivial remark.

For a second Loder waited; then, with a movement of resignation, he laid his hand on Blessington's arm. "Very well" he said. "But, if my fate is black, witness it was my wife who sent me to it." His faint pause on the words, the inference he left to word itself in the presence of these people, had a savor of recklessness. The small insensibility of his earlier slip vanished before it. He experienced a strong reaction of confidence in his luck. With a cool head, a steady step and a friendly pressure of the fingers on Blessington's arm, he allowed himself to be drawn across the reception rooms, through the long corridor and down the broad flight of steps that led to the conservatory.

The conservatory was a feature of the Bramfell town house, and to Loder it came as something wonderful and beloved for, with its clustering green branches, its slight, unoppressive scents, its temperately pleasant atmosphere. He felt no wish to speak as, still guided by Blessington, he passed down the shadowy paths that in the half light had the warmth and mystery of a southern garden. Here and there from the darkness came the whispering of a voice or the sound of a laugh, bringing with it the necessary touch of life. Otherwise the place was still.

Absorbed by [illegible] of solitude, contrasting so remarkably with the noise and crowded glitter left behind in the reception rooms, he had moved halfway down the first path before the business in hand came back to him with a sudden sense of annoyance. It seemed so pottry to mar the quiet of the place with the absurdity of a side show. He turned to Blessington with a touch of abruptness.

"What am I expected to do?" he asked.

Blessington looked up, surprised. "Why, I thought, sir"—he began; then he hastily altered his tone. "Oh, just enter into the spirit of the thing. Lady Astropp won't put much strain on your credulity, but she'll make a big call on your solemnity." He laughed.

He had an infectious laugh, and Loder responded to it.

"But what am I to do?" he persisted. "Oh, nothing. Being the priestess, she naturally demands acolytes, but she'll let you know that she holds the prior place. The test is so fixed that she sees nothing beyond your hands, so there's absolutely no delusion." He laughed once more. Then suddenly he lowered his voice and slackened his steps. "Here we are," he whispered in pretended awe.

At the end of the path the space widened to the full breadth of the conservatory. The light was dimmer, giving an added impression of distance; away to the left Loder heard the sound of splashing water, and on his right hand he caught his first glimpse of the tent that was his goal.

It was an artistic little structure—a pavilion formed of silky fabric that showed brome in the light of an oriental lamp that hung above its entrance. As they drew closer a man emerged from it. He stood for a moment in conversation, making abrupt signs, then, catching sight of them, he came forward, laughing.

"My George," he exclaimed, "it's as dark as limbo in there! I didn't see you at first. But I say, Blessington, it is a beauty shame to have such a thing deceived barrier shutting off the sorceress. If she gazes at the crystal, mayn't we have something to gaze at too?"

Blessington laughed. "You want too much, Gatling," he said. "Lady Astropp underrcands the value of the unattainable. Come along, sir;" he added to Loder, drawing him forward with an energetic pressure of the arm.

Loder responded, and as he did so a flicker of curiosity moved him. And with the speculation came the remembrance of how she had assured Chilcote that on one point at least he was thoroughly able. He had spoken then from the height of a past experience—an experience so fully passed that he wonder-

THE RIGHT KIND OF A BOY

THE RIGHT KIND OF CLOTHES

Of course there is a right kind of a boy—just as there is the right kind of a suit to put him in. The right kind of a boy doesn't want to bother too much about his clothes after he has them on. He doesn't want the seams to rip when he slides down the banisters, plays leap frog or jumps hitching posts.

Our spring and summer garments for the boy's wear are ready and we particularly request mothers to come to see how well we can dress the boy in a good looking, stylish, durable suit at a moderate cost.

We've every cut of suit that's right and our prices run, in sizes from 5 to 15 years, something like this—

$2.50, $3.50, $4, $5 up to $8.

If this store has a specialty, it is clothing boys rightly, handsomely and economically.

No Place For Grumblers.

A man who stands on the street corner chewing and spitting, telling how the government should be run, cursing the town, finding fault with his grandmother because she was a woman, claiming that the merchants are a lot of thieves, that the lawyers and newspaper men would skin a man to a finish and a whole lot more, is a nuisance and an abomination. Any town pestered with one or more such worthies would be justified in exercising cowhide authority on the bosom of their trousers. No one is obliged to live where he is not suited. If things don't suit you go where they will. A growler and a soreheel in a town is an enterprise killer every time.

Orange Blossoms.

Much uncertainty exists as to why the orange blossom has been so much worn by brides, but the generally opinion seems to be that it was adopted as an emblem of fruitfulness. Accordling to some authorities, the practice has been derived from the Saracens, among whom the orange blossom was regarded as a symbol of a prosperous marriage, a circumstance which is partly to be accounted for by the fact that in the east the orange tree bears ripe fruit and blossoms at the same time.

Sweetest of All.

Outistest, tell you, I enjoyed the sleep I got this morning. Fogey—Scientists say it's the sleep you get before midnight that does you the most good. Outiste—That may be, but it's the sleep I get after I'm called in the morning that makes me feel good.

"How did Mrs. Gotthere contrive to break her husband of smoking?"

"She wouldn't allow any cigars in the house except what she bought herself, and he had to smoke them to avoid hurting her feelings."

Reasonable.

Father (after a long search for a book)—Well, here it is. I wonder why one always finds a thing in the last place in which one hunts? Son—I expect it's because when we find what we are looking for we stop hunting.

Chance For a Laugh.

Aspirant—What do you think of my little poem, "He Always Refused to Smile?" Editor—Well, I think if you had given him the poem to read you would have broken the spell.

RUNNING EXERCISE.

Said to Be the Best Means of Making the Heart Strong.

The kind of exercise one should take for his heart's sake is extremely important. Therefore, to effect the heart sufficiently, must be vicorous, though not too vigorous. Ordinary walking, while healthful, falls short of this requirement. That enfeebleness and light exercises generally are also deficient in this respect is proved by the fact that, while all humankind naturally indulge in light exercises, yet heart ailments are prevalent among them. Every one that is not bedridden walks more or less, and I have read learned articles which try to prove that walking is the only exercise man requires. But if a man never runs he could not, if he would, run fairly fast even half a mile. So the argument is in effect that a man need not be able to run. I cannot agree to this conclusion, for walking at a moderate pace affects heart action only slightly.

Running, of all exercises for the heart, is, I think, the best. Of course one who has a weak heart cannot immediately run either fast or far, nor is it necessary for the average individual to learn to run great distances at a high speed, but every one owes it to his health to be able to run without distress, say half a mile at a fair pace. Let him begin by lopping one-eighth or one-quarter of a mile, then half a mile, which distance he may ultimately run reasonably fast.—G. Elliot Flint in Outing Magazine.

THE OCEAN'S BOTTOM.

Two Vast Valleys Traverse the Bed of the Atlantic.

The Atlantic ocean covers two vast valleys. One of these passes between the Cape Verde islands and the Azores, and it is of great depth. It runs close up to Europe and comes to an end close to the British Isles, where a ridge or crest of land separates it from the basin of the North sea. The other valley runs in the main parallel to the first, from which it is separated by an elongated strip of land, of which the Azores forms a supermarine continuation. This strip does not exceed a depth of 9,000 feet, while the height amounts to 9,500 feet. The first valley, like its confrere, is also very deep, its bottom being stretched at a depth of nearly four miles below the surface. Passing along South America and leaving the Bermudas to the left it goes along Newfoundland and Labrador, finally ending just south of Greenland the undulating landscape thus consists of two vast parallel valleys or mountains. Further north the land lies higher, and the sea is relatively speak-

Snails In Wedlock.

"Snails in wedlock, so you might suppose, live tranquilly," said a nature student. "They are not petulant and fiery, not quick tempered. They quarrel little. I have made a study of snails in wedlock, and I have found them singularly affectionate. Their eyes are at the tips of their horns. When they meet they draw in their horns, bringing their eyes close together so that they may exchange a tender look. Snails in wedlock put their heads together in a manner suggestive of kissing. I have often seen a snail husband carrying dainty bits of green to his wife—a good provider Snail sweethearts are soaked, but they do not make love openly. If a third snail approaches they go and hide under a dead leaf."

Marriage Lottery.

Every year in the Bunal country, in India, about October, a marriage lottery is held. The names of all the marriageable girls and of the young men of the circle who want to get married are written on slips of paper and thrown into separate earthen pots. From these they are drawn against one another by the local wise man. This simply determines the fact that the Bunal girl has come out and is ready to be married, and the youth whose name is drawn against here thereby obtains a letter of introduction, with authority to make love immediately with what ardor and success he is capable of.

Feminine Finance.

A poor lady whose husband had just failed was bemoaning the fact.

"At any rate," she said, as she wiped the tears from her eyes, "the Brown failure was worse than ours."

"How so?" said one, who knew that her husband's smashup had been terrible.

"Why," she said, "we only failed for 5 cents on the dollar, whereas Mr. Brown failed for fifty-five."

His Best Bread.

Baker—I keep the best bread. Customer (who is complaining of the quality of the bread)—I don't doubt it. Baker—Then what have you to complain about? Customer—That is what of keeping the best bread you should sell the best and keep the bad for yourself.

High Charge.

"Electricity in the atmosphere affects your system," said the doctor.

"Yes," said the patient, who had paid 2 guineas for two visits. "There are times when it's very hard to prove that."—London Tit-Bits.

Generally speaking, you are perfectly safe from lightning anywhere within twenty feet of a properly insulated lightning conductor.

PEOPLE OF BRITTANY.

The Women Mostly Bald and the Men Mostly Have Long Hair.

"The women, not the men, go bald in Brittany," said a barber. "They go bald where it shows most—above the ears. Women, quite bald above the ears, are as common in Brittany as baldheaded men are with us.

"Brittany is a granite strewn, hilly, well wooded country in northwestern France, overlooking the sea. It is New Hampshire, with the sea added. The Breton peasants speak a language which resembles Welsh. They hate strangers, and they wear a peculiar costume.

"This costume is what causes the baldheaded woman. One part of it, the coif, or headdress, a cap of white linen, pleated, and quite be drawn back very taut from the temples. Drawn back thus, as taut as it will go, it begins to pull out the fine hair of everyone, and by the time she is thirty-five or forty the Breton peasant woman looks as if she were the victim of some horrible disease, for, from her temples to well behind her ears, she is as bald as an egg.

"The men, on the contrary, are never bald. For one reason, they work bareheaded. For another reason, because of the low, animal type of man that preserves a hend of thick, coarse hair to the end. They also eat a great deal more of Brittany—drunk every day or two, putting all the work on their wives, shouting cheerful insults in the Breton tongue at tourists."

THE BUTTE HILL.

Where Fortunes Were Made and Spent In a Day.

When Daly had acquired the properties surrounding the Anaconda, he opened up the Butte hill. One must have a vivid imagination to picture to himself the growth of Butte from that time on during Marcus Daly's life. Fortunes were made and spent in a day. An army of men descended into the mines daily to strip them of their treasure, huge forests were despoiled of their timber to shit and shore up the excavations and protect the earth above, for these copper veins are often 300 feet wide. Immense quantities began to vomit their clouds of smudge from scores of furnaces scattered over the hill; the moans and clash of huge pumps could be heard in the depths forcing the water to the surface; the pound of hammers and the

In reading advertisements of Vassar Stain we notice one man claiming that his varnish stain is a ferment in it. We should think that, if a varnish stain had pigment in it, it would be a paint, not a Stain. The makers of Campbell's Varnish Stains come right out and guarantee that their stain does not contain any pigment, but will not require any stirring up, and will not obscure the grain in the wood over which it is applied. Guess we'll buy Campbell's. R. B. Wallace sells it.

EMPEY HILL.

There was a gloom cast over this neighborhood on Monday, 22d April, when the news was spread that Mrs. Sagar had been killed. While rolling for Mr. Penny, the roller struck a rough place and threw him off, striking his head on the frame work, rendering him unconscious. He was picked up and carried to the house, and all that human hands could do was done. Dr. Newton was sent for immediately, but arrived too late to be of any service, as he had passed away about twenty minutes before. He was of a bright disposition, and was thought a great deal of, and will be missed in this neighborhood and in the home. His parents and friends have the sympathy of the community in their sad bereavement.

On Wednesday, the 24th, the community was again shocked at the very sudden death of Mr. Henry Abbott, a well known and respected resident of this place. He was troubled with heart failure for some time, working in the field when he saw his young friend chasing a neighbor's sheep. He chased him to get them off, and then got in the rig with Mr. Pearson and suddenly fell over dead. He leaves a bereaved wife and two daughters to mourn his loss. Mr. Abbott will be missed, as he was liked and very perhaps as well with the whole community at large in this, their hour of trouble. The funeral was conducted at Union Friday.

On Friday the news was circulated that Mrs. Smith, mother of Mr. Joe Smith, had passed to her reward. She had been visiting with her daughter, Mrs. Thompson, of Belleville, when she was taken ill and died there. She was an old resident of this place and was highly respected. Her funeral took place in Empey Hill church on Sunday, and was conducted by Rev. Woodger, of Melrose.

The upsetting of the rig struck Fuller's horse, completely demolishing the rig and the driver. D. Pretty was hurt quite badly and had a narrow escape. Later, as S. Sproule and S. Corbett had the team harnessed to a buggy, they ran away the second time, throwing both from the rig. The team was caught near the Five Mile house.

BRONCHIAL COUGHS.

BREATHE HYOMEI'S HEALING AIR AND BRONCHIAL COUGHS WILL BE QUICKLY CURED.

The most irritating and annoying form of cough is that sometimes called Bronchial coughs. People subject to bronchial troubles realize that a change in the weather or they are exposed to a draft of cold air, usually brings on a cough. It is very disagreeable, irritating and annoying.

Bronchial troubles cannot be cured by stomach drugs. The only method of cure is by direct treatment, that reaches the affected parts and gives relief at once. Hyomei is composed of the same gums that are used in the Hyomei Inhaler, and when breathed through the inhaler it kills the irritated mucous membrane and germs of bronchial tubes and quickly overcomes the irritation.

Hyomei is the result of long continued action of the mucous membrane lining the air passages and lungs, and all throat diseases, so that it needs a local treatment to reach them. Breathe Hyomei.

We do not want anyone's money unless Hyomei gives relief, and we are not so absolutely agree that money will be refunded if it does not give satisfaction.

Every druggist should be able to supply you with Hyomei or we will send you a complete outfit, by mail, postpaid, and every package is sold with the positive guarantee that it will do you nothing unless it cures. Book's Hyomei Company, Buffalo, N.Y.

Napanee, May 4th, 1907.

Upon receipt of which Mr. Scott made the following reply:

Dear Friends and Associates,—

I accept the memento and address in the same spirit that it is given. I assure you that I appreciate both, more especially the esteem and regard you have toward me and mine. Our acquaintance and friendship have been a source of pleasure to me, and I will always look back with a great deal of pleasure upon the enjoyable and I trust profitable times we have had together. As time and space separate us, I trust we will remember and appreciate the good feeling that has existed between us. It is with considerable regret that I feel myself compelled to give up my position with Madill Bros. and I hope my successor will be more than able to fill the position that I am vacating; but with pleasure to each of you and with profit to the firm which you all represent and take a great interest in. Thanking you again for the beautiful memento and good wishes to Mrs. Scott and myself and wishing you all happiness and prosperity,

I remain yours in friendship,

THE JAMESTOWN EXPOSITION.

The Jamestown Exposition, which opened on April 26th, 1907, promises to be one of the most interesting of the larger expositions which have been held in later years. Its location at Sewall's Point, on the historic Hampton Roads, within nine miles from the city of Norfolk, Virginia, and directly opposite Old Point Comfort, in itself will appeal to many, and the magnificent array of warships that will congregate here from all the countries of the world will attract a tremendous number of people from all parts of the American continent, as well as from abroad. To Canadians who have not had the privilege of visiting the South this event will be the best opportunity that will present itself, and the low transportation rates that are offered will lend an additional attraction.

The only Canadian exhibit at this great fair will be that of the Grand Trunk Railway System, who have erected a building of their own, in which the resources and attractive features of Canada will be shown, and at which building Canadians will be welcome, and where all information may be obtained. Another feature that is offered is the many different routes that can be taken to this Exposition from Canada, including rail, river and ocean journeys. The true hospitality of the Southern people, the historic city that surrounds the locality, and the many things to see and do, should be the means of inducing a large number to go from the north. Grand Trunk Agents will gladly give information as to rates and routes.

ity of irony far into the background. The thought of Chilcote and of the one flaw in their otherwise flawless scheme rose to his mind. Instinctively he laid everything in hands.

"Where is the sympathetic current?" he asked quietly. His thoughts were busy with the question of whether he would or would not be justified in beating an undignified retreat.

"Better, you may be sure, of course," said the voice softly. It sounded languid, but very rational. The idea of retreat vanished suddenly from Loder's mind. In the world of low voices and shaded lights people never adopted extreme measures—no scenes were made, nothing practicable or even allowable. He leaned back slowly, while he summed up the situation. By any unlucky chance this woman knew Chilcote to have adopted jewelry and had seen the design of his rings the night of his own scarred finger would suggest question and comment. If, on the other hand, he left the pavilion without excuse or if without apparent reason he refused to remove the rings, he opened up a new difficulty, a fresh road to curiosity. It came upon him with unusual quickness—the obstacles and the best, the speedy decision. He glanced round the tent; then unconsciously he straightened his shoulders. After all, he had stepped into a fairly easy, if not an unusual, territory out in squeezing his way back. Then he realized that the soft, ingratiating tones were sounding once more.

"You must take off your rings."

"It's the passing of my hands over eyes while I look into the crystal that gets up sympathy"—a slender hand moved swiftly into the light and picked up the ball—"and rouses my eyes and the pictures in your mind. Now, will you please take off your rings?"

The very naturalness of the request alarmed him. It was a risk. But, as Chilcote had said, risk was the salt of life.

"I'm afraid you think me very troublesome." The voice came again, penitently low and conciliatory.

For a brief space Loder wondered uncertainly how long or how well Chilcote, Lady Astrupp, then he disposed the question. Chilcote had never mentioned her until tonight, and thing casually as Lady Bramfell's sister. Then it dawned on him that it was becoming in throwing the dice with fate. Without further delay he drew off the rings, dropped them into his left hand as he placed his hands on the smooth table.

Then, at the moment that he replaced them, a peculiar thing occurred.

From the further side of the dark curtain came in quick, rustling stir of a skirt and the slight scrape of a chair pushed either backward or forward. Then there was silence.

Now, silence can suggest anything to the profound thought to imbecility. In this case the suspension was all of something had happened, that some other thing had taken place, was as much to Loder as the darkness of the tent or the band of light that crossed the floor, but what had occasioned it, what it stood for, he made no attempt to decide. He sat bitingly conscious of his hands spread open on the table, of the tingling of the nerves that were invisible to him, vividly aware of the awkwardness of his position. He felt with instinctive certainty that a new chord had been struck; but a seldom acts on instinctive certainty.

If the presence of his hands had struck this fresh note, then any added thing would but heighten the dilemma. He set other and motionless.

Whether his impassivity had any bearing on the moment he had no way of knowing, but a further movement came from behind the partition. Whatever the emotions that had caused the sharp rustle of skirts and the sharp scrape of the chair, they had evidently subsided or been dominated by other feelings.

The next indication of life that came to him was the laying down of the crystal ball. It was laid back upon the table with a slight jerk that indicated a decision come to, and almost simultaneously the seer's voice came to him again, but the tone was lower than it had been before, and its extreme calm seemed slightly shaken—whether by joy, regret, surprise or curiosity it was impossible to say.

"You will think it strange," she began. "You will think"— Then she stopped.

There was a pause, as though she waited for some help, but Loder remained mute in difficulty a silent tongue and a cool head are usually man's best weapons.

His silence was disconcerting. He heard her stir again.

"You will think it strange," she began once more. Then quite suddenly she checked and controlled her voice. "You must forgive me for what I am going to say," she added in a completely different tone, "but crystal gazing is such an illusive thing. Directly you put your hands on the table I felt that there would be no result, but I wouldn't admit the defeat. Women are such born cheats that they can never acknowledge that any fish, however big, has slipped the hook." She laughed softly.

At the sound of the laugh Loder shifted his position for the first time. He could now hear her hands rub, but it struck him with a slight sense of confusion. A precipitate wish to rise and pass comment on the discovery into the wide spaces of the conservatory came to him, though he made no attempt to act upon it. He knew that, for some inexplicable reason, this woman behind the screen had lied to him—in the controlling of her speech, in her change of voice. There had been one moment in which an impulse or an emotion had almost mastered her; then training, instinct, or it might have been diplomacy, had conquered, and the moment had passed. There was a riddle in the very atmosphere of the place—and he objected to riddles.

But Lady Astrupp was absorbed in her own concerns. Again she changed her position, and to Loder, listening attentively, it seemed that she leaned forward and examined his hands afresh. The sensation was so acute that he withdrew them involuntarily.

Again there was a confused rustle. The crystal ball rolled from the table, and the seer laughed quickly. Obeying a strenuous impulse, Loder rose.

He had no definite notion of what he expected or what he must avoid. He was only conscious that the partition, with its silk draperies, its scent of musk and its intolerable secrecy, was no longer endurable. He felt cramped and confused in mind and muscle. He stood for a second to straighten his limbs; then he turned and, moving directly forward, passed through the portiere.

After the dimness of the pavilion the conservatory seemed comparatively light, but without waiting to grow accustomed to the altered light he moved onward with deliberate haste. The long green alley was speedily traversed. In his eyes it no longer possessed greenness, no longer suggested freshness or repose. It was simply a means to the end upon which his mind was set.

As he passed up the flight of steps he drew his rings from his pocket and slipped them on again. Then he stepped into the glare of the thronged corridor.

Some one hailed him as he passed through the crowd, but with Chilcote's most absorbed expression he hurried on. Through the door of the supper room he caught sight of Blessington and Eve. Instantly for the first time his expression changed, and he turned them directly toward them.

"Eve," he said, "will you excuse me? I have a word to say to Blessington."

She glanced at him in momentary surprise; then she smiled in her quiet, self possessed way.

"Of course," she said. "I've been wanting a chat with Millicent Gower, but Bobby has required so many eyes entertaining"—She smiled again, this time at Blessington, and moved away to-ward the girl in green who was standing alone.

Instantly she had turned Loder took Blessington's arm.

"I know you're tremendously busy," he began in an excellent imitation of Chilcote's hasty manner. "I know you're tremendously busy, but I'm in a fix." One glance at Blessington's bewildered, ingenuous face told him that plain speaking was the method to adopt.

"Indeed, sir?" In a moment Blessington was on the alert.

"Yes. And I—I want your help."

The boy reddened. That Chilcote should appeal to him stirred him to an uneasy feeling of pride and uncertainty.

Loder saw his advantage and pressed it home. "It's come about through this crystal gazing business. I'm afraid I didn't play my part—rather made an ass of myself. I wouldn't swallow the thing, and—and Lady Astrupp"— He paused, steadying Blessington with a glance. "Well, my dear boy, you—you know what women are."

Blessington was only twenty-three. He reddened again and assumed an air of profundity. "I know, sir," he said, with a shake of the dubious head.

Loder's sense of humor was keen, but he kept a grave face. "I knew you'd catch my meaning. But I want you to do something more. If Lady Astrupp should ask you who was in her tent this past ten minutes, I want you"— Again he stopped, looking at his companion's face.

"Yes, sir?"

"I want you to tell an immaterial lie for me."

Blessington returned his glance; then he laughed a little unconfortably. "But surely, sir"—

"She recognized me, you mean?" Loder's eyes were as keen as steel.

"Yes."

"Then you're wrong. She didn't." Blessington's eyebrows went up.

There was silence. Loder glanced across the room. Eve had parted from the girl in green and was moving toward them, exchanging smiles and greetings as she came.

"My wife is coming back," he said, "will you do this for me, Blessington? It—it will smooth things." He spoke quickly, continuing to watch Eve. As he had hoped, Blessington's eyes turned in the same direction. "It will smooth matters," he repeated—"smooth them in—in a domestic way that I can't explain."

The shot told. Blessington looked round.

"Right, sir," he said. "You may leave it to me." And before Loder could speak again he had turned and disappeared into the crowd.

CHAPTER XVI.

HIS business with Blessington over, Loder breathed more freely. If Lady Astrupp had recognized Chilcote by the rings and had been roused to curiosity the incident would demand settlement sooner or later—settlement in what proportion he could hazard no guess as on the other hand, her obvious change of manner, her evident lie, any other source—he had a hazy idea that a woman's behavior could never be gauged by accurate theories—he had safeguarded Chilcote's interests and his own by his securing of Blessington's good offices. Therefore he knew would be reliable and discreet. With a renewal of confidence—a pleasant feeling almost of unusualness had been groundless—he moved forward to greet Eve.

Her face, with its rich, clear coloring, seemed to his gaze to stand out from the crowd of other faces as from a frame, and a sense of pride in beauty him. In every eye but his own her beauty belonged to him.

His face looked alive and masterful as she reached his side. "May I monopolize you?" he said with the quickness of speech borrowed from Chilcote. "We—we see so little of each other."

Almost as if compelled, her lashes lifted, and her eyes met his. Her glance was puzzled, uncertain, slightly troubled. Instantly Loder's memory of actual semblance he had proved his superiority over Chilcote. For the first time he had been given a direct personal acknowledgment of his power. Involuntarily he drew nearer to her.

"Let's get out of the crush," he said, moving forward with a dozen purposes, then passed, unable to make further headway.

As they stood there he looked back at her. "What a study in democracy a crowd always is!" he said.

She responded with a bright, appreciative glance, as if surprised into naturalness. He wondered sharply what she would be like if her enthusiasms were really aroused. Then a stir in the corridor outside caused a movement inside the room, and with a sense of danger's quiescence he was enabled to make a passage to the door.

There again they were compelled to halt. But though tightly wedged into his new position and guarding Eve with one arm, Loder was free to survey the brilliantly thronged corridor over the head of a man a few inches shorter than himself, who stood directly in front of him.

"What are we waiting for?" he asked good humoredly, addressing the back of the stranger's head.

The man turned, displaying a genial face, a red mustache and an eyeglass. "Hullo, Chilcote!" he said. "Hope it's not on your feet I'm standing."

Loder laughed. "No," he said. "And don't change the position. It's the nearest an inch higher I should be blind as well as crippled."

The other laughed. It was a pleasant surprise to find Chilcote amiable under discomfort. He looked round again in slight curiosity.

Loder felt the scrutiny. To create a diversion he looked out along the corridor. "I believe we are waiting for something," he exclaimed. "What's this?" Then quite abruptly he ceased to speak.

"Anything interesting?" Eve touched his arm.

He said nothing. He made no effort to look round. His thought as well as his speech was suddenly suspended.

The man in front of him let his eyeglass fall from his eye, then screwed it in again.

"Eve," he exclaimed, "here comes our sorceress! It's like the progress of a fairy princess. I believe this is the meaning of our getting penned in here." He chuckled delightedly.

Loder said nothing. He stared straight over the other's head.

Along the corridor, agreeably conscious of the hum of admiration she aroused, came Lillian Astrupp, surrounded by a little court. Her delicate face was lit up; her eyes shone under the faint gleam of her hair; her gown of gold embroidered net clung to her gracefully. She was radiant and triumphant, but she was also excited. The excitement was given evidence in her laugh, in her gestures, in her eyes, as they turned quickly in one direction and then another.

Loder, gazing in stupefaction over the other man's head, saw it—felt and understood it with a flash—and that leaped back over a space of years. As in a shifting panorama he saw a night of disturbance and confusion in a tariff Italian valley—a confusion from which one face shone out with something of the pale, alluring radiance that filtered over the billiards from the crescent moon. It passed across his consciousness slowly, but with a slow completeness, and in its light the incidents of the past hour stood out in a new aspect. The echo of recollection stirred by Lady Bramfell's voice, the re-echo of it in the sister's tones; his own blindness, his own egregious assurance—all struck across his mind.

Meanwhile the party about Lillian drew nearer. He felt with instinctive certainty that the supper room was its destination, but he remained motionless, held by a species of fatalism. He watched her draw near with an unchanged face, but in the brief space that passed while she traversed the corridor he gauged to the full the hold that the past possessed over him, and somehow had gained over his mind. With an unlooked for rush of feeling he realized how dearly he would part with it.

As Lillian came closer the meaning of her manner became clearer to him. She talked incessantly, laughing now and then, but her eyes were never quiet. These skimmed the length of the corridor, then glanced over the heads crowded in the doorway.

"I'll have something with me, sweet, Geoffrey," she was saying to the man beside her as she came within hearing. "You know what I like—a sort of sandwich contained by a cover." Then she said the words her glance wandered. It rose at rest uninterestedly on a boy a yard or two in front of them, and then moved on, but itself inevitably to his face.

The glance was quick and direct. He saw the look of recognition spring across it; he saw her lips compress suddenly as the crowd in the corridor parted to let her pass. Then he saw what seemed to him a miracle.

Her whole expression altered, her lips parted, and she colored with annoyance. She looked like a spoiled child who, seeing a bonbon box, opens it—to find it empty.

As the press about the doorway melted to give her passage the red haired man in front of Loder was the first to take advantage of the space. "Jove, Lillian," he said, moving forward, "you look as if you expected Chilcote to be somebody else, and are disappointed to find he's only himself!" He laughed delightedly at his own joke.

The words were exactly the tonic Lillian needed. She smiled her usual undisturbed smile as she turned her eyes upon him.

"My dear Leonard, you're using your eyeglass. When that happens you're never responsible for what you see."

Her words came more slowly and with a touch of languid amusement. Her composure was suddenly restored.

Then for the first time Loder changed his position. Moved by an impulse he made no effort to dissect, he stepped back to Eve's side and slipped his arm through hers—successfully concealing his left hand.

The warmth of her skin through her long glove thrilled him unexpectedly. His impulse had been one of self defense, but the result was of a different character. At the quick contact the wish to fight for—to hold and defend—the position that had grown so dear woke in renewed force. With a new determination he turned again toward Lillian.

"I caught the same impression—without an eyeglass," he said. "Why did you look like that?" He asked the question steadily and with apparent carelessness, though through it all his mind was alert, his senses keen.

She responded with a bright, appreciative glance, as if surprised into naturalness. He wondered sharply what she would be like if her enthusiasms were really aroused. Then a stir in the corridor outside caused a movement inside the room, and with a sense of danger's quiescence he was enabled to make a passage to the door.

"Do you see what I mean, Eve?"

of her skin through the soft glove. Then abruptly she put him from her. She saw Lillian's eyes—indifferent, angered, slightly contemptuous, and a second later he heard her voice.

"My dear Jack," she said sweetly, "how absurd of you! It was simply the contrast of your eyes peering over Leonard's hair. It was like a gorgeous sunset with a black cloud overhead." She laughed. "Do you see what I mean, Eve?" She affected to see Eve for the first time.

Eve had been looking calmly ahead. She turned now and smiled serenely. Loder felt no vibration of the arm he held, yet by an instant intuition he knew that the two women were antagonistic. He experienced it with the divination that follows upon a moment of acute suspense. He understood it, as he had understood Lillian's look of recognition when his forehead, eyes and nose had shown him to be himself; her blank surprise when his close shaven lip and chin had proclaimed him Chilcote.

He felt like a man who has looked into an abyss and stepped back from the edge, outwardly calm, but mentally shaken. The commonplaces of life seemed for the moment to hold deeper meanings. He did not hear Eve's answer; he paid no heed to Lillian's next remark. He saw her smile and turn to the red haired man; felt he must let her move on into the supper room, followed by her little court. Then he pressed the arm he was still holding. He felt an urgent need of companionship, of a human expression to the crisis he had passed.

Eve looked up. "Out of the room?" she said.

He looked down at her, compelling her gaze. "Out of the room—and the house," he answered. "Let us go home."

CHAPTER XVII.

THE necessary formalities of departure were speedily got through. The passing of the corridors, the gaining of the carriage, seemed to Loder to be automatic processes. Chilcote, then, he sat by Eve's side and,again felt the forward movement of the horses, he had leisure for the fit time to wonder whether the time that had passed since he left the supper room had actually been that of a moment.

Only that night he had unconsciously laughed at Chilcote's incident in his life of a sketch in which the lights and shadows have been obliterated and lost. Now that it pressed heavily on him, startlingly and incredibly intact. He saw the small houses of Seatsalare, background for the small bills—saw them as plainly as when he himself had sketched them on his memory. He heard again the voice that remained the same, even to the central figure; only the eye and the hand of the artist had altered.

At this point Eve broke in upon his thoughts. Her first words were curiously coincidental.

"What did you think of Lillian Astrupp tonight?" she asked. "Wasn't her gown perfect?"

Loder lifted his head with an almost guilty start. Then he answered straight from his thoughts.

"I—I didn't notice it," he said, "but her eyes reminded me of a cat's eyes —and she runs like a cat. I never seemed to see it—until tonight."

Eve changed her position. "She was very artistic," she said contentedly. "Don't you think the gold gown was beautiful with her pale colored hair?"

Loder felt surprised. He was convinced that Eve disliked the other, that she was not sufficiently versed in women to understand her point of view. "I thought"— he began. Then he wisely stopped. "I didn't see the gown," he substituted.

Eve looked out of the window. "How unsympathetic men are!" she said. But her tone was strangely free from censure.

After this there was silence until Grosvenor square was reached. Having left the carriage and passed into the house, Eve paused for a moment at the foot of the stairs to give an order to Crapham, who was still in attendance in the hall, and again Loder had an opportunity of studying her. As he looked a sharp comparison rose to his mind.

"A fairy princess!" he had heard the red haired man say as Lillian Astrupp came into view along the Bramfell corridor, and the simile had seemed particularly apt. With her grace, her delicate, fair subtle attraction, she might well be the outcome of imagination. But with Eve it was different. She also was generous and attractive, but it was grace and attraction of a different order. One was beautiful with the beauty of the white rose that springs from the hothouse and withers at the first touch of cold; the other with the beauty of the wild rose on the cliffs above the sea, that keeps its petals fine and transparent in face of salt spray and wet mist. Eve, too, had her realm, but it was the realm of real things. A great confidence, a feeling that with her strength and even if all other faiths were shaken, touched him suddenly. For a moment he stood irresolute, watching her mount the stairs with her easy, assured step. Then a determination came to him. While fortune was kind he must be in luck tonight. He would put his fortune to one more test. He swung across the hall and ran up the stairs.

His face was keen with interest as he reached her side. The hard outline of his features and the straight eyes of his eyes were softened as when he had paused to talk with Lakeley. Action was the touch that in a moment had changed under it as another's might change under the influence of stirring music or good wine.

Eve saw the look and again the uneasy expression of surprise crossed her eyes. She paused, her hand resting on the banister.

Loder looked at her directly. "Will you come into the study as you came that other night? There's something I want to say." He spoke quietly. He felt master of himself and of fate.

She hesitated, glanced at him and then glanced away.

"Will you come?" he said again. And as he said it his eyes rested on the sweep of her thick eyelashes, the curve of the back hair.

At last her lashes lifted and the perplexity and doubt in her blue eyes moved him. Without waiting for her answer, he leaned forward.

"Say yes?" he urged. "I don't often ask for favors."

Still she hesitated. Then her decision was made for her. With a new boldness in their gaze, drawing her nearer, he forward gently but decisively toward Chilcote's rooms.

And then a fire burned brightly, the desk was laden with papers, the lights were nicely adjusted, even the chairs were in their accustomed places. Loder's senses responded to each suggestion. It seemed but a day since he had been in that room precisely as he had left it—the niche needing but the man.

To hide his emotion he crossed the floor quickly and drew a curtain forward. In less than six hours he had run up and down the scale of emotions. He had passed through the fire of fear, the sudden sight of Chilcote had lifted him to the skies; since then surprise and the sense of danger had seemed to be all that he could feel. He had known the full meaning of the word "risk," and from every combination he had come out conqueror. He bent over the chair as he pulled it forward to hide the expression in his face.

"Sit down," he said gently.

Eve moved toward him. She moved slowly, as if hesitating, and her emotions stirred her—distrust, uncertainty and a curious half dominant, half suppressed questioning that it was difficult to define. Loder remembered her shrinking coldness, her reluctant tolerance on the night of her first visit, and his individuality, his certainty of power, kindled afresh. Never had he been more completely himself or more Chilcote seemed so complete a shadow.

As Eve seated herself he moved forward and leaning over the back of her chair. The impulse that had filled him in his interview with Renwick, that had guided him as he drove to the reception, was dominant again.

"I tried to say something as we drove to the Bramfells' tonight," he began. "Like many men who possess the capacity for an impersonal cause, he was bungling, even blunt, in the stating of his own. "Will you hear it, or will you go on from where I broke off?"

Eve half turned. Her face was still puzzled and questioning. "Of course," She sat forward again, clasping her hands.

He looked thoughtfully at the back of her head, at the slim outline of her shoulders, the glitter of the diamonds about her neck.

"Do you remember the day, three weeks ago, that we talked together in this room—the day a great many things seemed possible?"

This time she did not look round. She kept her gaze upon the fire.

"Do you remember?" he persisted quietly. In his college days men who loved had used the quiet persistence had been wont to lose heart. Eve heard it now for the first time and, without being aware, answered to it.

"Yes, I remember," she said.

"On that day you believed in me." In his earnestness he no longer attenuated Chilcote; he spoke with his own steady radiance. He saw Eve stir, unclasp and clasp her hands, but he went steadily on. "On that day you saw me in a new light. You acknowledged me." He emphasized the slightly peculiar word. "But since that day" He paused, conscious that day your feelings have changed, your faith in me has fallen away." He watched Eve's head as he made no sign, save to lean still nearer to the fire. He crossed his arms over the back of the chair. "I have failed, I've failed," he said suddenly. "I've not been —myself since that day." As he said the word he was conscious forsook him slightly. He lostched the necessary lie, yet his egotism clamored for vindication. "All men have their lapses," he went on. "There are times—there are days and weeks when I—when my"— The word "nerves" touched his tongue, hung upon it, then died away unspoken.

Very quietly, almost without a sound, Eve had risen and turned toward him. She was standing very straight, her face a little pale, the hand that rested on the arm of her chair trembling slightly.

"John," she said quickly, "don't say that word! Don't say that hideous word 'nerves!' I don't feel that I can hear it tonight—not just tonight. Can you understand?"

Loder stepped back. Without command, he felt suddenly and strangely at a loss. Something in her face struck him silent and perplexed. It seemed that without preparation he had stepped upon dangerous ground. With an undefined apprehension, he waited, looking at her intently.

"I can't explain it," she went on with nervous haste, "I can't give any reasons, but quite suddenly the—the force has grown unbearable. I—I wish you to be patient and silent a little longer?" He spoke without consideration. He was conscious of no subterfuge underneath his words. In the first excreise of conscious strength the primitive desire to relieve distress in him by his own sovereignty submerged every other emotion. "Don't enter into the thing," he said; "like you, I don't like explanations. I can only tell you that on the day we talked together in this room I was myself—in the full possession of my reason, the full knowledge of my own capacities. The man you have known in the last three weeks, the man you have imagined in the last four years, is a shadow, fib unreality—a weakness that I have overcome. There is a new Chilcote—if you will only see him."

Eve was trembling as he ceased; her face was flushed; there was a strange brightness in her eyes. She was moved beyond herself.

"But the other you—the old you?"

"You must be patient." He looked down into the fire. "Times like the last three weeks will come again—must come again; they are inevitable. When they do come, you must shut your eyes—you must blind yourself. You must ignore them—and me. Is it a compact?" He still avoided her eyes.

She turned to him quietly. "Yes—if you wish it," she said, below her breath.

He was conscious of her gaze, but he dared not meet it. He felt sick at the part he was playing, yet he held to it tenaciously.

"I wonder if you could do what few men and fewer women are capable of?" he asked at last. "I wonder if you could learn to live in the present?" He lifted his head slowly and met her eyes. "This is an—an experiment," he went on. "And, like all experiments, it has good phases and bad. When the bad phases come round I—I want you to tell yourself that you are not altogether mine to command—altogether—that I am suffering too—in another way."

There was silence when he had spoken, and for a space it seemed that Eve would make no response. Then the last surprise in a day of surprises came to him. With a slight stir, a slight, quick rustle of skirts, she step-pod forward and laid her head to his.

The gesture was simple and very sweet. Her eyes were shut and full of light as she raised her face to his, her lips parted in unconscious appeal.

There is no surrender so seductive as the surrender of a proud woman. Lo-der's blood stirred, the undeniable suggestion of the scene thrilled and disconcerted him in a tumult of thought. Honor, duty, principle, rose in virile barriers; but honor, duty and principle are but words to a headstrong man. The full significance of his position came to him as it had never come before. His hand closed on hers; he bent toward her, his pulses beating unevenly.

"Eve!" he said. Then at the sound of his voice he suddenly hesitated. It was the voice of a man who has forgotten everything but his own existence.

For an instant he stayed motionless. Then very quietly he drew away from her, releasing her hands.

"No," he said. "No, I haven't got the right."

CHAPTER XVIII.

THAT night for almost the first time since he had adopted his dual role Loder slept ill. He was not a man over whom ingination held any powerful sway. His doubts and misgivings seldom ran to speculation upon future possibilities. Nevertheless the fact that, consciously or unconsciously, he had adopted a new attitude toward Eve came home to him with unpleasant force during the hours of darkness, and long before the first hint of daylight had slipped through the heavy window curtains he had arranged a plan of action—a plan wherein, by the simple method of litter gather avoiding her, he might soothe his own conscience and safeguard Chlicote's domestic interests.

It was a satisfactory if a somewhat negative arrangement, and he rose next morning with a feeling that things had begun to shape themselves. But chance sometimes has a disconcerting knack of forestalling even our best planned schemes. He dressed slowly and descended to his solitary breakfast with the pleasant sensation of having put last night out of consideration by the turning over of a new leaf, but scarcely had he opened Chilcote's letters, conveyed by the lakes, than a glance at the morning's newspaper then it was borne in upon him that not only a new leaf, but a whole sheaf of new pages had been turned in his prospects by a hand infinitely more powerful and arbitrary than his own. He read with a certain sense of a few moments that the letters he had first opened had, in reality, served to highlight and accentuate rather than to dim the memory of Eve. Socially understood from childhood, but in this knowledge, coupled with the fact that Petrov's comfortably far away, we are apt to rest content. It is only to the eyes that see through long distance glasses, the minds that regard the present as nothing more or less than an inevitable link joining the future to the past, that the distant, debatable land stands out in its true political significance.

To the average reader of news the statement of Russia's move seemed scarcely more important than had the first report of the border risings in January, but to the men who had watched the growth of the disturbance it came always with portentous meaning. Through the entire ranks of the opposition from Ronin himself downward it evoked a thrill of expectation—that peculiar prophetic sensation that every politician has experienced at some moment of his career.

In no business of his party did this feeling strike deeper root than in Loder. Indeed with a lifelong interest in the eastern question, specially equipped by personal knowledge to hold and profit from an episode in most Persian affairs, he read the signs and portents with instinctive insight. Seated at Chilcote's table, surrounded by Chilcote's letters and papers, he forgot the breakfast that was slowly growing cold, forgot the interests and dangers, personal or pleasurable, of the night before, while his mental eyes persistently conjured up the name of Persia, traveling with steady deliberation from Merv to Meshed, from Meshed to Herat, from Herat to the empire of Delhi. That it was not the fact that the Hazaras had risen against the shah that occupied the thinking mind, nor was it the fact that Russian and not Persian troops were destined to subdue them, but the deeper, more important consideration that an armed Russian force had crossed the frontier and was encamped within twenty miles of Meshed, the city on which covetous Russian eyes have rested ever since the days of Peter the Great.

So Loder's thoughts ran as he read and reread the news from the varying political standpoints of the papers he continued to run when, some hours later, an urgent telephone message from the St. George's Gazette asked him to call at Lakeley's office.

The message was interesting as well as imperative, and he made a prompt response. The thought of Lakeley's keen eyes and shrewd enthusiasms always possessed strong attractions for his own slower temperament, but even had this impetus been lacking, the knowledge that at the St. George's offices, if anywhere, the true feelings of the party were invariably voiced would have drawn him without hesitation.

It was scarcely 12 o'clock when he turned the corner of the tall building, but already the busy spirit that Lakeley everywhere diffused was making itself felt. Loder smiled to himself as his eyes fell on the day's boards with their uncompromising headings and passed onward from the string of gayly painted lads drawn up for the noon-time delivery to the clerk of the tape machine in the subscribers' office, and a glimpse through the open door of the subeditors themselves, each occupied with his particular task; then without time for further observation he found himself at Lakeley's door. Without waiting to knock, as he had for once compelled to do on the one or two previous occasions that business had brought him there, he immediately turned the handle and entered the room.

Editors' offices differ but little in general effect. Lakeley's surroundings were rather more elaborate than is usual, as became the dignity of the oldest Tory evening paper, but the atmosphere was unmistakable. As Loder entered he glanced up from the desk at which he was sitting, but instantly returned to his task of looking through and making a pile of early evening editions that were spread around him. His cost was off and hung on the chair behind him, and he pulled vigorously at a long cigar.

"Hello! That's right," he said incidentally. "Make yourself comfortable half a second, while I skim the St. Stephen's."

His salutation pleased Loder. With a nod of recognition he crossed the office to the brisk fire that burned in the grate.

For a minute or two Lakeley worked steadily, occasionally breaking the quiet by an unintelligible remark or a vigorous stroke of his pencil. At last he dropped the paper with a gesture of satisfaction and leaned back in his chair.

"Well," he said, "what d'you think of this? How's this for a complication?"

Loder turned round. "I think," he said quietly, "that we can't overestimate it."

Lakeley laughed and took a long pull at his cigar. "And we mustn't be afraid to let the Sefborough crowd know it, eh?" He waved his hand to the poster of the first edition that hung before his desk.

Loder, following his glance, smiled.

Lakeley laughed again. "They might have known it all along if they'd cared to do-duce," he said. "Did they really believe that Russia was going to sit calmly looking across the Heri-Rud while the shah raped at assassins? But what became of you last night? You had a regular prophesying of the future business at Meshed's; the great Fraide looked in for five minutes, went on with him to the club afterward and was there when the news came in. 'Twas a great night!"

Loder's face lighted up. "I can imagine it," he said, with an unusual touch of warmth.

Lakeley watched him intently for a moment. Then with a sudden action he leaned forward and rested his elbows on the desk.

"It's going to be something more than imagination for you, Chilcote," he said impressively. "It's going to be solid earnest." He spoke slowly and with rather more than his usual shrewd decisiveness; then he paused to see the effect of his announcement.

Loder was still studying the flaring poster. At the other's words he turned sharply. Something in Lakeley's voice, something in his manner, arrested him. A tinge of color crossed his face.

"Reality?" he said. "What do you mean?"

For a further space his companion watched him, then with a rapid movement he tilted back his chair.

"Yes," he said, "I've still Fraide's instincts are never far out. He's quite right. You're the man."

Still quietly, but with a strange undertone of excitement, Loder left the fire and, coming forward, took a chair at Lakeley's desk.

"Do you mind telling me what you're driving at?" he asked in his old, incredulous tone.

Lakeley still scrutinized him with an air of brisk satisfaction; then with a gesture of finality he tossed his cigar away.

"My dear chap," he said, "there's going to be a branch somewhere—and Fraide says you're the man to step in and fill it! You see, five years ago, when things looked lively on the gulf and the Sandar Abbas business seemed to light, you did some promising work, and a reputation like that sticks to a man even when he turns slacker! I won't deny that you've slacked abominably," he added as Loder made an uneasy movement, "but slacking has different effects. Some men ruin to seed, others mature. I had almost put you down on the black list, but I've altered my mind in the last two months."

Again Loder stirred in his seat. A host of emotions were struggling for his mind. Every word wrung from Lakeley was another stimulus to pride, another subtle tribute to the curious force of personality.

"Well?" he said. "Well?"

Lakeley smiled. "We all know that Sefborough's ministry is—well, top-heavy," he said. "Sefborough is building his card house just a story too high. It's a toss up what'll upset the balance. It might be the army, of course, or it might be education, but it might quite as well be a matter of foreign policy."

They looked at each other in comprehensive silence.

"You know as well as I that it's not the question of whether Russia comes into Persia, but the question of whether Russia goes out of Persia when these Hazaras are subdued; I'll lay you what you like, Chilcote, that within one week we hear that the risings are suppressed, but that Russia, instead of retiring, has advanced those battalions nearly miles and comfortably ensconced herself at Meshed—as she ensconced herself on the shores of Abbasabad." Lakeley's nervous, energetic figure was bracing, his light blue eyes brightened by the intensity of his interest.

"If this were comes before the Easter recess," he went on, "the first poll can be summoned for the motion for adjournment. And if the right man does it in the right way I'll lay my life I'll be a tall in Sefborough's coffin."

Loder sat very still. Overwhelming possibilities had suddenly opened out before him. In a moment the unreality of the past months had become real; a tangible justification of the rewards and the impostures was suddenly made possible. In the stress of understanding he, too, leaned forward, and, very like its elbows on the desk, took his face between his hands.

For a space Lakeley made no remark. To him man and man's moods came second in interest to his paper and his party politics. That Chilcote should be clamorous of the glories he had spurned up seemed only natural; that he should show that consciousness in a becoming fashion he took for granted. For some seconds he made no attempt to disturb him, but at last his own irrepressible facility made silence unbearable. He caught up his pencil and tapped impatiently on the desk.

"Well, Loder," he said very slowly, "it's not the sort of moment in which a man doubts himself."

CHAPTER XIX.

AND so it came to pass that Loder was freed from one responsibility to undertake another. From the morning of March 27, when Lakeley had expounded the political programme in the offices of the St. George's Gazette, to the afternoon of April 1 he found himself a central figure in the whirlpool of activity that formed itself in Conservative circles.

With the acumen for which he was noted, Lakeley had touched the keystone of the situation on that morning, and succeeding events, each fraught with its own importance, had established the precision of his forecast.

Minutely watchful of Russia's attitude, Fraide quietly organized his forces and strengthened his position with a masterly grasp of opportunity, and to Loder the attributes displayed by his leader during those trying days formed a useless and absorbing study. Setting the thought of Chilcote aside, ignoring his own position and the risks he dared, he had fully yielded to the glamour of the moment and in the first freedom of a life that for years had been governed by all that he possessed of activity, capacity and determination to the cause that had chilcote's.

Singularly privileged in a constant personal contact with Fraide, he learned many valuable lessons of tact and organization in those five vital days during which the tactics of a whole party hung upon the item of news from a country thousands of miles away. For should Russia subdue the insurgent Hazaras and, taken with the honors of the peacemaker, retire across the frontier, then the politicat arena would remain unturbed, but should the all important movement predicted by Lakeley become an accepted fact before parliament rose for the Easter recess, then the first blow in the fight that would rage during the succeeding session must inevitably be struck. In the meantime it was Fraide's difficult position to wait and watch and yet prepare his fighting line.

It was early in the afternoon of March 29 that Loder, in response to a message from Lakeley, called quietly with the Fraides. Being delayed by some communications from Wark, he was a few minutes late in keeping his appointment, and on being shown into the drawing room found the little group of three that was to make the party already assembled—Fraide, Lady Sarah—and Eve. As he entered the room they ceased to speak, and all three turned in his direction.

In the first moment he had a vague impression of recognizing suitable to Lady Sarah's cordial greeting, but he knew that his stately and unemotional smile was for Eve alone, while a quick sense of surprise and satisfaction passed through him at sight of her. For an instant he was keeping her she would mark his avoidance of her since their last eventful interview; then a gesture of finality he tossed his cigar passing doubt. For, before all things, he knew her to be a woman of the world.

He took Fraide's outstretched hand, and again he looked toward Eve, waiting for her to speak.

She met his glance, but said nothing. Instead of speaking she smiled at him in a smile that was far more reassuring than any words, a smile that in a single second conveyed forgiveness, approbation and a warm, almost tender sense of comradeship and confidence. The remembrance of that smile stayed with him long after they were seated at the table and for the future the remembrance of the lunch itself, with its pleasant private sense of satisfaction, was destined to return to him in retrospective moments. The delightful atmosphere of the Fraides' home life had a master spirit, a wonder and an enigma to him, but on this day he seemed to grasp its meaning by a new light as he watched Eve often under its influence and felt himself drawn imperceptibly from the position of a speculative outsider to that of an intimate. It was a fresh side to the complex, fascinating life of which Fraide was the master spirit.

These reflections had grown agreeably familiar to his mind. The talk, momentarily diverted into the local channels, was quietly drifting back to the inevitable question of the "situation" that in private moments was never far from their lips, when the event that was to mark and separate that day from those that had preceded it was unceremoniously thrust upon them.

Without announcement or apology, the door was suddenly flung open and Lakeley entered the room.

His face was brimming with excitement, and his eyes flashed. In the first haste of the entry he failed to see that there were ladies in the room and, crossing instantly to Fraide, held an open telegram before him. "This is official, sir," he said. Then at last he glanced round the table.

"Lady Sarah!" he exclaimed. "Can you forgive me? But I have given a hundred pounds to be the first with this!" He glanced back at Fraide.

Lady Sarah rose and stretched out her hand. "Mr. Lakeley," she said, "I more than understand!" There was a thrill in her words, a spiritual vision and her eyes also turned toward her husband.

Of the whole party Fraide alone was perfectly calm. He sat very still, his small, thin figure erect and dignified, as his eyes scanned the message that meant so much.

Eve, who had sprung from her seat and passed round the table at sound of Lakeley's news, was leaning over his shoulder reading the telegram with him. At the last word she lifted her head, her face flushed with excitement.

"How splendid it must be to be a man!" she exclaimed, and without premeditation her eyes and Loder's met.

In this manner came the news from Persia and with it Loder's definite call. In the momentary stress of action it was impossible that any thought of Chilcote could obtrude itself. Events had followed each other too rapidly, decisive action had been too much the urgent upon him, to allow of hesitation, and it was in this spirit, under this vigorous pressure, that he made his attack upon the government on the day that followed Fraide's luncheon party.

That indefinable altogetherness, that alert sensation of impending storm, that is so strong an index of the parliamentary atmosphere was very keen on that memorable 1st of April. It was obvious in the crowded benches on both sides of the house, in the oneness of purpose that insensibly made itself felt through the ranks of the opposition and found definite expression in Fraide's stiff figure and tightly shut lips, in the unmistakable uneasiness that lay upon the ministerial benches.

But notwithstanding these indications of battle the early portion of the proceedings was unmarked by excitement, being tinged with the purposeless lack of vitality that had of late marked all affairs of the Sefborough ministry, and it was not until the adjournment of the house for the Easter recess had with a sudden grasp of opportunity, and to Loder the attributes displayed by his leader during those trying days formed a useless and absorbing study. Setting the thought of Chilcote aside, ignoring his own position and the risks he dared, he had fully yielded to the glamour of the moment and in the first freedom of a life that for years had been governed by all that he possessed of activity, capacity and determination to the cause that had chilcote's.

It was a fresh side to the complex, fascinating life of which Fraide was the master spirit.

These reflections had grown agreeably familiar to his mind. The talk, momentarily diverted into the local channels, was quietly drifting back to the inevitable question of the "situation" that in private moments was never far from their lips, when the event that was to mark and separate that day from those that had preceded it was unceremoniously thrust upon them.

Without announcement or apology, the door was suddenly flung open and Lakeley entered the room.

His face was brimming with excitement, and his eyes flashed. In the first haste of the entry he failed to see that there were ladies in the room and, crossing instantly to Fraide, held an open telegram before him. "This is official, sir," he said. Then at last he glanced round the table.

"Lady Sarah!" he exclaimed. "Can you forgive me? But I have given a hundred pounds to be the first with this!" He glanced back at Fraide.

Lady Sarah rose and stretched out her hand. "Mr. Lakeley," she said, "I more than understand!" There was a thrill in her words, a spiritual vision and her eyes also turned toward her husband.

Of the whole party Fraide alone was perfectly calm. He sat very still, his small, thin figure erect and dignified, as his eyes scanned the message that meant so much.

Eve, who had sprung from her seat and passed round the table at sound of Lakeley's news, was leaning over his shoulder reading the telegram with him. At the last word she lifted her head, her face flushed with excitement.

"How splendid it must be to be a man!" she exclaimed, and without premeditation her eyes and Loder's met.

In this manner came the news from Persia and with it Loder's definite call. In the momentary stress of action it was impossible that any thought of Chilcote could obtrude itself. Events had followed each other too rapidly, decisive action had been too much the urgent upon him, to allow of hesitation, and it was in this spirit, under this vigorous pressure, that he made his attack upon the government on the day that followed Fraide's luncheon party.

That indefinable altogetherness, that alert sensation of impending storm, that is so strong an index of the parliamentary atmosphere was very keen on that memorable 1st of April. It was obvious in the crowded benches on both sides of the house, in the oneness of purpose that insensibly made itself felt through the ranks of the opposition and found definite expression in Fraide's stiff figure and tightly shut lips, in the unmistakable uneasiness that lay upon the ministerial benches.

But notwithstanding these indications of battle the early portion of the proceedings was unmarked by excitement, being tinged with the purposeless lack of vitality that had of late marked all affairs of the Sefborough ministry, and it was not until the adjournment of the house for the Easter recess had been moved that the spirit of activity hovering in the air descended and galvanized the assembly into life. It was then, amid a stir of interest, that Loder slowly rose.

Many curious incidents have marked the speechmaking annals of the house of commons, but it is doubtful whether it has ever been the lot of a member to hear his own voice raised for the first time on a subject of vital interest to his party, having been denied all initial assistance of minor questions asked or interpolated by supporters made. Of all those gathered together in the great building on that day, only one man apprehended the difficulty of Loder's position, and that man was Loder himself.

He rose slowly and stood silent for a couple of seconds, his body traced, his fingers touching the sheaf of notes that lay in front of him. To the waiting house the silence was effective. It might mean oversesurance or it might mean a failure of power. It excited moment. Either possibility had a tinge of piquancy. Moved by the same impulse, fifty pairs of eyes turned upon him with new interest, but up in the ladies' gallery Eve clasped her hands in sudden apprehension, Lady Sarah sitting stiffly in his seat, turned and shot one swift glance at the man on whom, against prudence and precedent, he had pinned his faith. The glance was swift, but very searching, and with a characteristic movement of his wiry shoulders he resumed his position and his usual grave, attentive attitude. At the same moment Loder lifted his head and began to speak.

Here at the outset his inexperience met him. His voice, pitched too low, only reached those directly near him. It was a moment of great strain. Eve, listening intently, drew a long breath of suspense and let her fingers drop apart. The skeptical, watchful eyes that faced him, line upon line, seemed to flash and brighten with critical interest. Only Fraide made no change of expression. He sat placid, serious, attentive, with the shadow of a smile behind his eyes.

Again Loder paused, but this time the pause was shorter. He drew his head erect and waited for was passed, and he saw his way clearly. With the old movement of the shoulders he straightened himself and once more began to speak. This time his voice rang quietly true and commanding across the floor of the house.

No first step can be really great. It must of necessity possess some prophecy than of achievement. Nevertheless it is by the first step that a man marks the value not only of his cause, but of himself. Following broadly on the lines that tradition has laid down for the Conservative party, Loder distinguished rather than displayed the vein of strong, persuasive eloquence that was his natural gift. The occasion that might possibly justify such a display of individuality might lie with the future, but it had no application in the present. For the moment his duty was to voice his party sentiments with as much lucidity, as much logic and as much calm conviction as he possessed in his capacity.

Standing quietly in Chilcote's place, he was conscious with a deep sense of gravity of the peculiarity of his position, and perhaps it was this unconscious and unstudied seriousness that lent him the tone of weight and judgment so essential to the cause he had in hand. It has always been difficult to arouse the interest of the house on matters of British policy in Persia,

HISTORICAL

Napanee, May 10th, '07

A meeting to organize a Lennox and Addington Historical Society was held in the Public Library building on Thursday evening, May 9th, at 7.30 p.m.

The following citizens were present: Mrs. H. T. Forward, Miss Ruth Morphy, Mrs. R. C. Cartwright, Mrs Peter Bristol, Mrs. A. W. Grange, Mrs. F. P. Miller, Mrs. F. E. Parritt, Mrs. D. C. Macnaughton, Mrs. Jehiel Aylsworth, Mrs. J. P. Vrooman, Miss J. F. Ham, Mrs. A. Macdonald, Mrs. J. A. Shibley, Mrs. H. Finkle, Mrs. W. S. Herrington, Miss Leonora Jarvis, Mrs. Clarance M. Warner, Messrs. Uriah Wilson, M.P., W. A. Bellhouse, Rev. F. T. Dibb, W. G. Herrington, F. F. Miller, W. T. Gibbard, R. A. Croskery, Rev. A. R. Conn, Ernest J. Walters, T. G. Carscallen, M.A., C. M. Wilson, James Daly, Dr. J. P. Vrooman, G. D. Hawley, Rev. Alexander Macdonald, Fred. Burtoss, Canon Jarvis, Rev. W. H. Emsley, L. J. Flach, and C. M. Warner.

On motion Mr. Clarance M. Warner took the chair, and delivered the following address:

Ladies and Gentlemen,—I have called this meeting at the request of a few friends, who on several occasions have expressed to me their wish to see the County of Lennox and Addington represented in the work of collecting the material necessary for the preservation of its records and documents required to make a complete and satisfactory history of any community.

During the two and a half years which I have spent in Napanee, I has been my privilege to secure many interesting papers, mags, and records of the early settlement of our County and Town, and I should like to see these housed in a proper place so that future generations may also have the pleasure of studying them.

The principal object in holding this meeting is to determine whether our citizens are sufficiently interested in this matter to warrant the formation of a Lennox and Addington Historical Society. Several ladies and gentlemen have encouraged the idea and I believe with such a support as we can obtain from the Ontario Historical Society, and the Ontario and Dominion Governments that we shall be able, to keep up with the other societies in the Province, and in time have our County history well written, and the Archives filled with rare and valuable historical relics.

Lennox and Addington occupies a peculiarly interesting situation historically—the landing of the United Empire Loyalists upon the shores of the Bay of Quinte, marks a place in Canadian history which all students recognize. It is in fact a turning point in the English rule of Canada. Dr. Ryerson has written a very valuable work on the settlement of these early pioneers, and Dr. Canniff's history will always be interesting to the student. What we want is a collection of all these books, and in addition all the original data from which these works have been compiled. I fear a vast amount of it has already been destroyed. Let us make it our object to see that what remains is carefully looked after.

I have sent a notice of this meeting to the various officials of Historical Societies throughout Ontario, and to the Professor of History in the most prominent colleges; also to those Government officials, both at Ottawa and Toronto, whose special work would make them interested in the movement.

The Ontario Historical Society provides in its constitution for the affiliation of the local societies, and I sincerely hope that you will decide to-night to organize, select officers, appoint a committee to draw up a proper Constitution and By-laws, and determine a proper annual fee.

I should like to hear from these present and have all sides of this subject discussed.

Mr. W. S. Herrington was appointed Secretary pro tem.

Rev. Canon Jarvis explained the working of Historical Societies in general and the benefits to be derived from such an organization in this County.

It was moved by the Rev. Canon Jarvis, and seconded by the Rev. W. H. Emsley, that this meeting considers that an Historical Society be formed to be known as the Lennox and Addington Historical Society and carried unanimously.

Communications were read by the acting Secretary from Miss Fitzgibbon, Secretary of the Woman's Canadian Historical Society of Toronto; David Boyle, Secretary of the Ontario Historical Society, and from Sir Gilbert Parker, wishing success and expressing ardent sympathy.

The following officers were unanimously elected for the first year:

Honorary Presidents — Rev. Canon Jarvis, John Gibbard, Esq.

President—Clarance M. Warner.

Vice Presidents—W. A. W. Grange.

Secretary Treasurer—Ulysses J. Flach.

Committee—Mrs. H. T. Forward, Fred. Burrows, Uriah Wilson, M.P., Sheriff Hawley, Rev. Alexander Macdonald.

The President thanked those present for the honor conferred, and explained that he had addressed a communication to the Mayor and Town Council, asking for the use of the upper floor of the Library building for the Society, and expressed a hope that the hall be plastered and steps put in, and the Council unanimously agreed to grant everything asked for. The President further explained that a subscription list had been circulated with a view to furnishing the room, and that the fourteen citizens who had been appointed had subscribed $85.00 for that purpose.

Moved by Dr. J. P. Vrooman, and seconded by the Rev. Mr. Conn, that the officers and committee meet as soon as practicable to draft a constitution and prepare By-laws. Carried.

Moved by Mr. Thomas Gibbard, and seconded by Mr. F. F. Miller, that the question of fees be left with the executive committee to report. Carried.

Moved by Mr. W. S. Herrington, and seconded by J. P. Vrooman, that Hon. President John Gibbard Esq., be invited to address the first meeting, to give reminiscences of early days, and that a stenographer be engaged to report the remarks in full. Carried.

A motion to adjourn was carried.

MARSHALL SAUNDERS

The Popular Canadian Author.

If the temperature of an author's popularity can be measured by the thermometer of sales, then surely the most popular writer in Canada is Miss Marshall Saunders, whose "Beautiful Joe" has sold 400,000 copies, and been translated into Swedish, German and Japanese.

At her grandfather's house in Milton, Nova Scotia, Miss Saunders was born in 1861, the daughter of a clergyman, and a descendant of the John Alden immortalized in verse by Longfellow. Her early days were spent in the beautiful land of Evangeline where the very air seems redolent of romance and historic memories. When she was six the family moved to Halifax, and there she received the foundation of her education in private and public schools until fifteen, when she was sent to a boarding school in Scotland and thence to France to put some finishing touches to her education.

On her return to Nova Scotia she taught school for a time and then drifted that real success could not be plucked like a rose in a garden; she must pay the price in years of observation, study, training and practice. She spent several years in Scotia, ready for the serious work of her life.

In 1894 the American Humane Educational Society offered a prize of $200 for the best story illustrating kindness to dumb animals. Miss Saunders determined to compete for it. She spent six months in writing a story, the background of which was largely autobiographic and the spirit pervading it her ardent love for animals, the silent appeal of their helplessness finding ever a sympathetic echo in her heart. The committee of award in giving the prize to her book "Beautiful Joe," said: "the author has genius, heart and insight. It is an admirable story, and should have an immense sale and become a standard for all libraries," and went begging among the publishers for six months before it was accepted. Miss Saunders having availed herself of the privilege of offering the money and retaining her manuscript.

When published, it gave her a place in the very front rank of writers of animal stories. Her "Tilda Jane," a simple, natural, pathetic yet humorous story, adds a new character to the charming literature of childhood. In her ambitious novel "Rose a Charlitte," she gives a delightful portrayal of the life of the Acadians in the historic country around St. Mary's Bay, a realm of idyllic romance, where traditions and customs seemed to sanctify and purify the people to higher things.

Entered according to Act of the Parliament of Canada, in the year 1907, by W. C. Rich, at the Department of Agriculture.

About Dr. Hugo's Health Tablets

We wish every non-down woman and every woman suffering from any disorder peculiar to her sex could read the letters we have from grateful users of Dr. Hugo's Health Tablets.

They would never afterwards doubt their statement that "They make Healthy Women."

We never violate confidence. We never yet published a letter without permission. There will be nothing wrong, however, in showing the following snatches from letters recently received.

"I think they are just wonderful."

"In less than a week I could see good results."

"I couldn't have got more good if I had gone to see Dr. Hugo himself."

"My physician gave me about your box."

"I am feeling now like a new woman, have better colors, eat better, sleep better, feel better."

"Health Tablets have done for me what my physicians could not do for me, i.e., made me a healthy woman."

These few abstracts show the appreciation in which these tablets are held by those who have used them.

If you are sick or not feeling as well as you would like to, we want you to take a box of these tablets.

You can't realize until then how much good one box will do you.

Philipsburg and the Millers.

Under the above heading the Rev. W. J. Bowman Tucker forcibly describes in the St John's, Que., News, a visit to Missisquoi Bay, Que., where a number of the exiled Palatinates landed from the old world. Later they removed to this County. We clip the following from the long article. Rev. Tucker is completing in book form much work in connection with a history of Garrison Miller and his Eastern brothers. Desiring to make the genealogical records as complete as possible, it will be a favor if any descendants who have not heard from him will write him at once, stating names, residence, family connection, etc. ED.

PHILIPSBURG.

This is a locality of much historic interest. A very interesting and able article is found in the most recent report of the Missisquoi Historical Society in which the writer endeavors to solve the question of the origin of Philipsburg as to the first settler. Missisquoi Bay, taking up some of the names at least of the first settlers. Thus for instance a Miller, Embury and Lawrence, we are able to give a rather positive answer to the question. Their first residence before reaching America was on the banks of the Shannon in Ireland. But they were only pilgrims and tenters there. And their own testimony on record, is that they were from Palatinate—a locality extending northward south of Switzerland and Switzerland is south western Germany on the Rhine river.

The brothers Wm. Adam Miller, a resident minister at Philipsburg, was brought him to St. Armands from Vermont, and behind his lively horse we are soon rolling up the hill towards the Vermont boundary line. One mile away and we have the farm where Peter Miller located some time shortly after 1788 and where he was succeeded by his son Capt. Miller, who received his military commission under the seal of Governor Robinson, and his grandaughter Mrs. Wm. Rowland, and her children, Agnes and Robert Rowland. Mrs. Rowland has kindly located about the south of the hill, and the national boundary line runs about a short distance to the north and north-west of the City of Kingston, some 5 miles east of the town of Philipsburg. From the king a grant of 12,000 acres of land was given to Peter Miller and his associates, in consideration of his ministry services rendered to the Royal Family of England. The original grant is still preserved in Ottawa—great grandson of Peter Miller at Missisquoi Bay, also had the original grant. Mr. Adam Miller was at first from Ireland, having just visited the home of his father, and from there have had the year previous spent time in Ireland. The writer of this article has also compiled Loss notes, some of which lay in Germany, it is possible that at this time the combined British commissioners signed a treaty with the United States, by which they gave the South of Montreal to the United States. Miller came now to have every privilege of a king's patents.

Among the early settlers we find the spacious and substantial stone residence built by Captain Chris. Miller in 1808. Some what originally to settle down to on examination of the premises of Philipsburg. Peter Miller looks large and must have been a man for in a private building dated 1808 not much doubt about the existence of his wonderful memorial window to his memory recently placed in the McMullin church at Lawrence Miller's church built in 1810 the first church built in Philipsburg, perhaps the oldest Methodist church in Canada. Miller has been in continuous use, and let us mark it. What a change in connection with the early church solidly built of the native marble stone. Of the pioneers of Philipsburg not all does not represent the earnest, strong spirit of the early settlers. Probably does not represent the earnest, strong spirit of the early settlers. Probably does not represent the earnest, strong spirit of the early settlers. Probably

By Katherine Cecil Thurston, Author of "The Circle," Etc.

"Bear?" she said teasingly. "Did I rub your fur the wrong way?" Then, seeing his expression, she tactfully changed her tone. "I'm sorry, Lodre. It was the same thing that struck me the night of Blanche's party—when you looked at me over Leonard Kaine's head. You remember?" She glanced away from him across the park to where the grass was already showing greener.

Chilcote felt ill at ease. Again he put his hand to his coat collar.

"Oh, yes," he said hastily; "yes." He wished now that he had questioned Lodre more closely on the proceedings of that party. It seemed to him on looking back that Lodre had mentioned nothing on the day of their last exchange but the political complications that absorbed his mind.

"I couldn't explain then," Lillian went on. "I couldn't explain before a crowd of people that it wasn't your dark head showing over Leonard's red one that surprised me, but the most wonderful, the most extraordinary likeness." She paused, laughing.

The car was moving slower. There was a delight in the easy motion through the fresh, early air. But Chilcote's uneasiness had been aroused. He no longer felt soothed.

"A likeness that he stated sharply.

She turned to him easily. "Oh, a likeness I have noticed before," she said. "A likeness that a person seemed strange, but that suddenly became incredible at Blanche's party."

She paused quickly. "Likenesses are an illusion," he said, "a mere imagination of the brain." His manner was almost his annoyance seemingly out of all proportion to the cause. Lillian looked at him afresh in slightly interested surprise.

"Yet not so very long ago, yourself"—she began.

"Nonsense!" he broke in. "I've always denied likenesses. Such things don't really exist. Likeness seeing is purely an individual matter—a preconception." He spoke fast. He was uneasy under the cool scrutiny of her green eyes. And with a sharp attempt at self control and reassurance he altered his voice. "After all, we're being very stupid!" he exclaimed. "We're worrying over something that doesn't exist."

Lillian was still lazily interested. To her own belief she had seen Chilcote last on the night of her sister's reception. Then she had been too preoccupied to notice either his manner or his health, though superficially it had lingered in her mind that he had seemed unusually reliant, unusually well on that night. A remembrance of the impression came to her now as she studied his face, upon which imperceptibly and yet relentlessly his vice was setting its mark, in the dull restlessness of eye, the unhealthy sallowness of skin.

Some shred of her thought, some suggestion of the comparison running through her mind, must have shown in her face, for Chilcote altered his position with a touch of uneasiness. He glanced away across the long sweep of tan covered drive stretching between the trees. Then he glanced furtively back.

"What likeness?" he asked sharply.

"By the way," he said quickly, "you wanted me for something?" The memory of her earlier suggestion came as a sudden boon.

She lifted her muff again and smelled her roses thoughtfully. "Oh, it was nothing, really," she said. "You sarcastic people are very shrewd suggestions sometimes, and I've been rather wanting a suggestion on an—an adventure that I've had." She looked down at her flowers with a charmingly attentive air.

But Chilcote's restlessness had increased. Looking up, she suddenly caught the expression, and her own face changed.

"My dear Jack," she said softly, "what a bore I am! Let's forget tedious things and enjoy ourselves." She leaned toward him caressingly with an air of concern and reproach.

The action was not without effect. Her sympathetic voice, the smile in her most affectionate gesture, each carried weight. With a swift return of assurance he responded to her tone.

"Right!" he said. "Right! We will enjoy ourselves!" He laughed quickly and again with a conscious movement lifted his hand to his mustache.

"Then we'll postpone the advice?" Lillian laughed too.

"Yes. Right! We'll postpone it." The word pleased him, and he caught at it. "We won't bother about it now, but we won't shelve it altogether. We'll postpone it."

"Exactly." She settled herself more comfortably. "You'll dine with me one night—and we can talk it out then. I see so little of you nowadays," she added in a lower voice.

"My dear girl, you're unfair!" Chilcote's spirits had risen. He spoke rapidly, almost pleasantly. "It isn't I who keep away. It's the stupid affairs of the world that keep me. I'd be with you every hour of the twelve if I had my way."

She looked up at the bare trees. Her expression was a delightful mixture of amusement, satisfaction and skepticism. "Then you will dine?" she said at last.

"Certainly. His reaction to high spirits carried him forward.

"Now nice? Shall we fix a day?"

"A day? Yes; yes—if you like." He hesitated for an instant, then again the impulse of the previous moment dominated his other feeling. "Yes," he said opened it, turning the pages rapidly. "What day shall it be? Thursday's full—and Friday—and Saturday. What a bore!" He still talked fast.

Lillian leaned across. "What a sweet book!" she said. "But why the blue crosses?"

She touched one of the pages with her gloved finger.

Chilcote jerked the book, then laughed, with a touch of embarrassment. "Oh, the crosses! Merely to remind me that certain appointments must be kept. You know my beastly memory! But what about the day? Shall we fix the day?" His voice was in control, but mentally her trivial question had disturbed and jarred him. "What day shall we say?" he repeated. "Monday next week?"

Lillian glanced up, with a faint exclamation of disappointment. "How horribly far away!" She spoke with genuine annoyance. "Jack, you're cruel! Why, I've only just arrived! Can't you be nicer to me than that?"

"Tomorrow! Oh, I—I"— He stopped.

"Jack!" Her voice dropped. It was true that she desired Chilcote's opinion on her adventure, for Chilcote's opinion on men and manners had a certain bitter shrewdness, but the exercise of her own power added a point to the desire. If the matter had ended with the gain or loss of a tete-a-tete with him, it is probable that, whatever its utility, she would not have pressed it, but the underlying motive was the stronger. Chilcote had been a satellite for years, and it was unpleasant that any satellite should drop away into space.

"Jack!" she said again in a lower and still more effective tone, and, lifting her muff, she buried her face in her flowers. "I suppose I shall have to dine and go to a music hall with Leonard—or stay at home by myself," she murmured, looking out across the trees.

Again Chilcote glanced over the long, tan strewn ride. They had made the full circuit of the park.

"It's tiresome being by oneself," she murmured.

For awhile he was irresponsive; then slowly his eyes returned to her face. He welcomed her for a second, and, leaning quickly toward her, he took his book and scribbled something in the vacant space.

She watched him interestedly. Her face lighted up, and she laid aside her muff.

"Dear Jack!" she said. "How very sweet of you!" Then, as he held the book toward her, her face fell. "Dine 23 Cadogan gardens, 8 o'c; talk with L.," she read. "Why, you've forgotten one essential thing!"

He looked up. "The essential thing?" She smiled. "The blue cross," she said. "Isn't it worth a little care?"

The tone was very soft. Chilcote yielded.

"You have the blue pencil," he said in sudden response to her mood.

She glanced up in quiet pleasure at her success, and, with a charming affectation of seriousness, marked the engagement with a big cross. At the same moment Mr. Grisbi, the car's speed, as the chauffeur waited for further orders.

Lillian shut the engagement book and handed it back. "Where can I drop you?" she asked. "At the club?"

The question recalled him to a sense of present things. He thrust the book into his pocket and glanced about him.

They had paused by Hyde park corner. The crowd of horses and carriages had thinned as the hour of lunch drew near, and the wide roadway of the park had an air of added space. The suggested loneliness affected him. The tall trees, still bereft of leaves, and the colossal gateway inconsequentially stirred the sense of mental panic that sometimes seized him in face of vastness of space or of architecture. In one moment Lillian, the appointment he had just made, the manner of its making, all left him. The world was filled with his own personality, his own immediate inclinations.

"I don't bother about me!" he said quickly. "I can get out here. You've been very good. It's been a delightful morning." With a hurried pressure of her fingers he rose and stepped from the car.

Reaching the ground, he paused for a moment and raised his hat; then, without a second glance, he turned and walked rapidly away.

Lillian sat watching him meditatively. She saw him pass through the gateway, saw him hail a hansom; then she remembered the waiting chauffeur.

CHAPTER XXI.

ON the same day that Chilcote had parted with Lillian—but at 3 o'clock in the afternoon—Lodre, dressed in Chilcote's clothes and with Chilcote's heavy overcoat slung over his arm, walked from Fleet street to Grosvenor square. He walked steadily, neither slowly nor yet fast. The elation of his last journey over the same ground was tempered by feelings he could not analyze. Utterly bracket even to himself. There was less of vehement elation and more of matured determination in his gait and bearing than there had been on that night, though the incidents of which they were the outcome were very complex.

On reaching Chilcote's house he passed upstairs, but, still following the routine of his previous return, he did not halt at Chilcote's door, but moved onward toward Eve's sitting room and there paused.

In that pause his numberless irregular thoughts fused into one.

He had the same undefined sense of standing upon sacred ground that had touched him on the previous occasion, but the outcome of the sensation was different. This time he raised his hand almost immediately and tapped on the door.

He waited, but no voice responded to his knock. With a sense of disappointment he knocked again; then, pressing his determination still further, he turned the handle and entered the room.

No private room is without meaning, whether trivial or the reverse. In a room perhaps more even than in speech, in look or in work does the impress of the individual make itself felt. There on the wax of outer things the inner self imprints its seal, enforces its fleeting claim to separate individuality. This thought, with its arresting interest, made Lodre walk slowly, almost seriously, halfway across the room and then pause to study his surroundings.

The room was of medium size—not too large for comfort and not too small for ample space. At a first impression it struck him as unlike any anticipation of a woman's sanctum. The walls paneled in dark wood, the richly bound books, the beautifully designed bronze ornaments, even the flowers, deep crimson and violet blue in tone, had an air of somber harmony that was scarcely feminine. With a strangely pleasant impression he realized this, and, following his habitual impulse, moved slowly forward toward the fireplace and there paused, his elbow resting on the mantelpiece.

He had scarcely settled comfortably into his position, scarcely entered on his second and more comprehensive study of the place, than the arrangement of his mind was altered by the turning of the handle and the opening of the door.

The newcomer was Eve herself. She was dressed in outdoor clothes and walked into the room quickly; then, as Lodre had done, she, too, paused.

The gesture, so natural and spontaneous, had a peculiar attraction. As she glanced up at him, her face alight with inquiry, she seemed extraordinarily much the owner and designer of her surroundings. She was framed by them in naturally and effectively as her eyes and her face were framed by her black hair. For one moment he forgot that his presence demanded explanation; the next she had made explanation needless. She had been looking at him intently; now she came forward slowly.

"John?" she said, half in appeal, half in question.

He took a step toward her. "Look at me," he said quietly and impressively. In the sharp desire to establish himself in her regard he forgot that her eyes had never left his face.

But the incongruity of the words did not strike her. "Oh," she exclaimed, "—I believe I knew directly I saw you here." The quick ring of life vibrating in her tone surprised him. But he had other thoughts more urgent than surprise.

EGZEMA AGAIN OVERCOME

ZAM-BUK CURES A CASE WHICH FOR TWO YEARS HAD DEFIED EVERY REMEDY TRIED.

A Farmer's Grateful Testimony.

No case of eczema, skin disease, or ulceration, should be despaired of until Zam-Buk has been applied. The case of Mr. Francis Pelmot, of St. Anne's, (Man.), is a powerful illustration of Zam-Buk's efficacy. He says: "I suffered from eczema for two years, and tried a great number of remedies. None of them, however, seemed to do me any good. The ailment was mostly in my legs, and both these were actually free from the knees down. A small sample box of Zam-Buk was given to me, and even so small a quantity as that did me a little good. I then obtained a proper supply, and by the time I had used a few boxes I was completely cured.

Zam-Buk differs from ordinary salves and embrocations in containing no mineral oil or fat. It is purely compounded from rich, healing herbal essences, and is an ideal natural combination of power and purity. It is highly antiseptic, and instantly kills all disease germs. Hence when settling on to wounds and skin diseases set up festering, blood poison, etc. For cuts, burns, scalds, ulcers, abscesses, pimples, boils, skin eruptions, sores, ringworm, spreading eczema, children's skin troubles, chafing sores etc., Zam-Buk is unequalled. It also cures piles. All druggists sell at 50c a box, or from Zam-Buk Co., Toronto, for price. 6 boxes for $2.50.

BRONCHIAL COUGHS.

BREATHE HYOMEI'S HEALING AIR AND ALL IRRITATION WILL BE QUICKLY CURED.

The most irritating and annoying form of cough is that termed bronchial. People subject to bronchial coughs, whenever there is a change in the weather or they are exposed to a draft will "catch" a bronchial cough, which is very disagreeable, irritating and annoying.

Bronchial troubles cannot be cured by stomach dosing. The medicated air of Hyomei is the only treatment that reaches the affected parts and gives relief and cure. It destroys all the disease germs that are present in the nose, throat and lungs, soothes and relieves the irritated mucous membrane in all parts of the bronchial tubes and quickly overcomes the irritation.

Bronchitis is really an inflammation of the mucous membrane lining the air passages and is purely a local disease, so that it needs a local treatment like that afforded by Hyomei.

We do not want anyone's money unless Hyomei gives relief and cure and we absolutely agree that Hyomei will be refunded unless the remedy gives satisfaction.

All druggists should be able to supply you with Hyomei or we will send it by mail on receipt of price, $1.00, and every purchaser is sold with the distinct understanding that it costs nothing unless it cures. Booth's Hyomei Company, Buffalo, N.Y.

My Hair is Scraggly

Do you like it? Then why be contented with it? Have to be? Oh, no! Just put on Ayer's Hair Vigor and have long, thick hair; soft, even hair. But first of all, stop your hair from coming out. Save what you have. Ayer's Hair Vigor will not disappoint you. It feeds the hair-bulbs; makes weak hair strong.

TAMWORTH.

Our town is in mourning. The death of Mr. D. E. Rose last Sunday morning was a great and sudden shock to the whole community. Never before in our time was there so large a funeral, which took place on Tuesday morning. The service was first held at the house, thence to the Methodist church. Rev. Mr. Spence preached the funeral sermon with the assistance of Rev. Mr. DeMille, of Roblin, and Rev. R. Allin, of Enterprise. Mr. Rose was liked by all. He very ably filled the position as superintendent of the Sunday school for forty years. Both Mr. and Mrs. Rose led the choir for over twenty-five years. Mr. Rose will be missed on every hand, as he was a very active man in all branches of business and church work. The remains were taken to Napanee cemetary for interment. Following are only a few of those from a distance who attended the funeral: Mrs. C. D. Wartman and niece, Miss McKim, Belleville; Rev. and Mrs. J. H. Chant, Miss Ella Chant, Newburgh; Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Gardiner, Mr. Nelles Gardiner, Miss J. A. McKim, Kingston; Mr. Jno. McKim, Perth; Mr. R. J. Deak, Millbrook; Mr. W. B. Skinner, Kingston; Geo. S. Hinch, Uriah Wilson, M.P., W. A. Rose, Robt. VICTORY OVER OUR SINS

SECRET OF CONQUEST IS IN THE DIVINE HELP.

FAITH IS A MIGHTY WEAPON

Life Is a Warfare—Continual Battle Necessary—But Success Is Assured—Some Giants of Evil Which the Christian Must Slay — Christ's Strength Is All — Sufficient For His Followers.

Entered according to Act of Parliament of Canada, in the year 1907, by Peter Wells Dewey, Toronto, at the Dept. of Agriculture, Ottawa.

Los Angeles, Cal., May 5.—That life is a battle with the giants of error and sin, but that he who seeks divine help is assured of victory, is the lesson of this sermon. The text is Numbers 13, xxxiii, "And there we saw the giants, the sons of Anak, which come of the giants."

The most dangerous and yet one of the most important duties assigned to a soldier in time of war is that of a spy. No soldier but the bravest and the most intelligent is ever selected by a commanding general for this dangerous mission. After the retreat from Long Island, George Washington needed information in reference to the numbers and the geographical position of the enemy. So he selected the brilliant Nathan Hale to penetrate the British lines and scan the fortifications of Sir William Howe. We all know the tragic end of that journey. Nathan Hale died, uttering the words, "I only regret that I have but one life to lose for my country." But in the sacrifice of that one life he became exalted to the American people the legacy of an example of heroism and faithfulness which is a perpetual inspiration for every generation since his day and which will be a perpetual inspiration to all unborn Americans to the end of time.

When the traitor Benedict Arnold was about to betray his trust and surrender West Point into the hands of the enemy, Sir Henry Clinton, the British commander, had to send a spy into the Gibraltar of America's fortifications. So he selected the Nathan Hale of his army, Major Andre. This officer was without doubt one of the most promising young soldiers of King George's army. He entered the American lines. He met the renegade Arnold. As a spy he was captured at Tarrytown and hanged by the neck until he was dead, as was the brilliant young American soldier, Nathan Hale. I am using these two notes of historical illustration to show the risk that a spy runs in order that his general may learn the position and the strength of the enemy. I am also using them to prove that only the skilled and the bravest and the best soldiers of an army are ever detailed by the commanding officers to perform the service of a spy. A spy once caught in the enemy's lines is always executed as soon as a court-martial can be summoned.

Moses may not have been an orator like Aaron, but he had the eloquence of action. He was one of the wisest leaders of men who ever lived. With marvelous executive skill he led the children of Israel out from the Egyptian enslavement. He led them through the Red sea. Now he was face to face with his tremendous foe. The promised land was before him. Moses was like Hannibal about to invade the Roman empire. He was like Xerxes with his million followers about to cross the Hellespont or the strait of Dardanelles. He was like Julius Cæsar invading the land of the Gaels. Moses knew well what was ahead. Therefore as a wise general and leader of men he sent forward to find out what kind of people lived in Canaan. He wanted to find out what were the fortifications of his enemies, what was their military discipline and the easiest way for the Israelites to attack them. He did just what General James Wolfe did when about to attack Quebec. He sent forward his spies to search the way up the heights of Abraham. Then when the British commander knew the way he commanded the troops to advance to the onslaught.

Now, what did the children of Israel hear about their foes when these spies came back with their reports? "Why," said most of these spies, "we can never capture those Canaanites. The inhabitants are a race of giants. A little five-year-old child has just as much show of whipping his father as we have of slaying those men. Those giants are also entrenched in impregnable fortresses. Every city is a huge walled town. Then these men are not the only giants, but their numbers are as multitudinous as the sands of the sea. There are many nations there and all working together. Oh, why did we come? Oh, why did we leave our homes in Egypt?" Thus did most of the spies report who went into the promised land. Yet forty years after-ward the sons of these men overcame the giants and their strongholds, and they themselves might have done if they had put faith in God. So many timid disciples of Christ in our day suffer from attacking the forces of sin in their entrenchments. They think of their own weakness instead of the omnipotence of God, who will fight for them. Our fault is that of these ancient Hebrews. Instead of going boldly to the fight we hold back and whimper, "We saw the giants, the sons of Anak, which come of giants."

The Kind You Have Always Bought

In the first place, [illegible] spies saw very tremendous physical proportions. The inhabitants of the promised land were not pygmies, such as Stanley found in the heart of Africa. They were the sons of Anak. They leaned up before the Hebrew spies like some of the Kentucky men who are six or seven feet in height. They were like the Goliath whom David, the shepherd boy, fought. They were the veritable human monsters of bone and sinew and muscle. They were men of mighty physical proportions. The same kind of giants are inhabiting the Judaean hills today.

When the tourist travels through the Holy Land and sees a long line of Bedouins riding past upon their beautifully caparisoned Arabian Shoreb breeds, they loom up so big that it seems as though they could take you up as a child and with their mighty arms crush you as easily as a huge boa constrictor could strangle a little fawn. There are living to-day in Palestine among the Bedouin tribes men just as great and powerful as was the Philistine adversary whom David heard taunting and defying Saul's army.

Do you, as wise men, think it wrong for these Hebrew spies to take a true measurement of the physical proportions of these giants? I do not. If I had been one of those spies I would have said to Moses and the people waiting for my report, as I would say now to the Christian young man just going into the temptations of the world: "You are going to have giants to fight in this world. Your are not going to fight a lot of pygmies. You must develop your brains. You must develop the strength of your arm. You must clean your weapons and put them in the finest trim. No man is ever able to successfully triumph over the mighty giants of life unless he fully draws upon all his resources of body, mind and soul." He would be a Goliath-like David who went forth to battle against a Goliath if he was a son of Anak unless his sling was in perfect condition, unless he chose the smoothest and roundest stone from the brook and unless he had practiced to a large degree in and took out upon it the smallest mark with the accuracy of a William Tell shooting the apple off the head of his son.

Moses did not want his spies to bring back a report of the giants' dwelling in the land of Canaan any more than God wants a mother or any father to belittle the temptations and the struggles which are ahead of their children in the battle of life. And one reason why so many children go morally and spiritually defeated is because their own parents do not sufficiently impress children lovingly and tenderly aside and tell them how powerful are the temptations that may come to them in the future and how to conquer them through themselves upon the divine power in order to resist those temptations.

Let me see. Your boy is about fifteen years old. Behold, he is just verging on young manhood. He has grown up under your protecting love and care. You have taught him the Bible. You have sent him to Sunday school. He has been surrounded him with noble, uplifting influences. You have been so careful of him that you would not allow him to stay away from your home at night. But tell me, what have you taught your boy about the secret sins of life? What have you told him about immoral acts and thoughts? "Oh, no," you answer, "I never told my son about the evils of this world, because I did not want to put ideas into his head of evil. He is as innocent as a little child. He's too young for such know." Is he too young? The enemy does not think so. Why, last week one of his classmates showed him a vile picture and told him what it meant. You say he is innocent? Yes, but do you not know that his very innocence may be the occasion of his moral overthrow? Do you not know, oh, mother, that many an innocent young girl has been led astray through her mother's ignorance to warn her of the snares that may be laid for her feet? Those young girls did not intend to do wrong. They thought they were trifling with a pygmy, and they suddenly awoke to find out they were in the grasp of a mighty giant. If fathers and mothers should not warn their children against the nature and power of temptation, who should? Yes, yes, the commandment when they reported to Moses that the Israelites had to fight giants. When we warn a friend against dangers we do not destroy the friend, but we may save him by putting him upon his guard.

Again, I notice that these spies reported other giants in the land besides the sons of Anak. This showed their wisdom. These other giants could not be so formidable in appearance as the Anakim, but they might be more powerful as they were secretly being better equipped and armed. Some of these savage giants might fight with swords and spears, some with a hand net, some with snares and stratagem, some with poisoned arrows, some by starvation and cold. So in our fight. Though a man is able to resist one giant in the battle of life, that does not prove that he can resist all temptations. He may not a drunkard, but that does not prove you may not be overthrown by the giant of sensuality, or by the giant of avarice, or by the giant of jealousy, or by the giant of the evil tongue. In an old legendary story I once read about the boy called Jack the Giant Killer. Now, every man, woman and child, if he is to be a true Christian, must be a giant killer. We all have some especial giant to fight, and every giant attacks his victims in a different way.

There was another fact to which the spies called Moses' attention. These giants were intrenched. They said, "The cities are walled and very great." They were not like the barrenless nomad tribes, living in tents and wandering about from place to place in search of rich pasture lands. They were giants who were rich in gold and silver and precious stones. In order to protect their increasing wealth they erected huge walls. These walls were almost impregnable. They could not be battered down. They were too high to be scaled. If the cities within these walls were ever captured it must be by strategy. The cities of Jericho, Ai, Heshbon and Jabaz were the Gibraltars of those days. If the inhabitants were very their guard and has enough food and water to resist a long siege they were safe from capture.

No man unless he has traveled in the east and has seen the width and the height of these walls encompassing the ancient cities has any adequate conception of their enormous strength. When Cyrus the Great, with his conquering host, came to the Babylonian city in 538 B. C., the ponderous gates of brass were slammed shut in his face, and he was absolutely helpless. Day after day, week after week, month after month, the siege went on. Cyrus was no nearer the conquest of Belshazzar's capital at the end of twelve months than he was in the beginning. The Persian general could have scattered the Babylonian troops like chaff before the wind if he only could have reached them. But Belshazzar and his soldiers simply laughed at and mocked him because the Babylonian walls were between them and the besieging army. Had not Belshazzar and his men got drunk one night while celebrating the king's birthday and allowed the lower gates under the river to be left open, and had not Cyrus that night diverted the river Euphrates from its channel and marched through the dry bed into the city during the wassail, the Persian general might never have been able to capture it. Cyrus might be able to take Babylon by stratagem, but never by battering down or scaling Babylon's impregnable walls.

When Agamemnon ended his long ten years' siege of old-Troy, he was just as helpless at the end of the siege as in the first month. Those walls, the impregnable Trojan wall-were still between him and his bride. Did Agamemnon after ten years' experience uselessly continue to batter his head against those impregnable stones? No. He resorted to strategy. He constructed a wooden horse and filled it with soldiers. Then he pretended that the siege was raised and that he was about to sail away to his own land. But no sooner was the huge horse drawn into the city by the Trojans and the night had fallen than the soldiers leaped out from the wooden hiding place and, rushing to the gates, flung them open. There the invading army was waiting. Armemnon rushed in and captured the doomed city. Walled in Troy had resisted direct attack, but it was captured by stratagem. Thus those Hebrew spies looked upon the towering walls of Jericho and Ai and Heshbon and Jahaz. They said: "Moses, the walls are too high. They are too thick and too strong to be overthrown.

Thus timid Christians look at the mighty intrenched walls "of sin. "Why," say some men, "what is the use of attacking the saloon? It is a giant that is intrenched behind the walls of politics. You can never dislodge him. You cannot find a people or a nation on the face of the earth that does not crave and use intoxicants. There is an unconquerable desire gnawing at people's palates which must be satisfied. On account of this almost universal craving the saloons to-day are the ballot box. They own our city and state and national governments. The churches are helpless."

"What is the use of attacking the great avarice?" says another. "Why even the church members themselves are in the mad struggle for gold." I know that the giants of avarice and of drunkenness and of licentiousness are intrenched in society. The walls of these giants are high and they are captured and overthrown by direct attack. But cannot they be overthrown by Christian strategy? Did not the Lord God Almighty overthrow the Jericho walls by the blast of the ram's horns? Cannot the Lord God Almighty, who turned the Nile into a river of blood and who divided the waters of the Red sea, overthrow the mighty fortress of Jericho totter and sway and fall before the archangel's trumpet, whose blast shall yet sound the deathknell of all worlds and universes and systems? Cannot God still win the battle for us over sin where human strategy fail?

But again I hear those Hebrew spies say: "Moses, there is still another danger. These giants are heroes of many battles, are now upon their guard. They have heard of the marvelous miracles which took place in Egypt. They know of the passage of the Red sea. They will fight until their last huge soldier drops dead. We have been in those cities. We have heard the giants talk. We have seen their elaborate preparations. It is simply useless for us, an untrained band of ex-slaves, to cope with these giants, who are inured to war and who will now fight to the death." Thus these Hebrew spies spoke. Thus Christians often speak in reference to the stand the intrenched giants of sin are making at the present day.

Now, all hunters know how dangerous it is to attack even harmless wild beasts when they are driven to bay or defending their young. For instance, the coyote or the small black bear or even the mountain lion at the sight of man in the open will turn and run, but corner them and their eyes will flash fire, and their savage lips will show their white teeth, and the claws will work convulsively. Thus it is with the giants of sin in our day. They know the forces of righteousness are moving on their fortresses. They know that they must conquer or be annihilated. Therefore we must not be surprised if the struggle is desperate.

O how I wish those who are facing the giants of evil in mortal combat, from you not cry as did Paul in times of old, "I can do all things through Christ, who strengthens me?" Why not receive the promise that divine strength by prayer and supplication, with you as Paul, can be cried "Lord, I thank thee. Now I have strength enough to burn"? Friends, facing the giants of life, facing the giants of temptation, facing them in your own physical and temporal weakness, will you not plead at the throne of grace that God may give you some strength to accomplish all things in his dear Son's name? God is saying: "Men, women and children, will you conquer? Will you defeat the giants of sin? Will you go over the garden and take the promised land?" His strength is at our disposal, as it was at the disposal of those ancient Hebrews. Shall we do as they did—turn back from the struggle because we are afraid? Those who are afraid hold the blessing from us, as he did from the Hebrews. Or shall we not rather go forward trusting in his omnipotent power and learn that in his strength we can overthrow giants?

Dangerous Purgatives.

MEDICINES OF THIS CLASS DO NOT CURE—THEIR EFFECT IS WEAKENING.

Nothing could be more cruel than to induce a weak, anaemic person to take a purgative medicine in the hope of finding relief. Ask any doctor and he will tell you that a purgative medicine merely 'sandpapers' through the bowels, weakening the tender tissues. He will tell you also that a purgative cannot possibly cure disease, or build up bad blood. Then the fact is weak and watery when the system is run down a tonic is the thing needed—not the only thing that will put you right—but in all this world there is no tonic so good as "Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. Every dose of these pills actually makes new, rich, red blood which fills the veins and gives every organ in the body and brings health and strength to weak despondent people. Miss Annie Beaudreau, Amherst, Magdalene Islands, Que., says:—"I was quite run down and palpitate violently at the least exertion. I suffered greatly from severe headaches. I tried several medicines which seemed actually to leave me worse. Then I was advised to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills, and a half dozen boxes have made me as well as I ever was. They have done me so much good that I would like every weak girl in the land to try them."

It was the new blood Dr. Williams' Pink Pills actually make that restored Miss Beaudreau to health and strength, and in the same way they cure such sufferers as those with anemia, indigestion, heart palpitation, neuralgia, rheumatism, and the secret ailments that make the lives of so many women and growing girls a burden. Sold by all medicine dealers or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

THE CANADIAN PICTORIAL.

This is the season of horse shows, so a large proportion of the contents of the May number of the famous Canadian fine-arts monthly, the Canadian Pictorial, deals with the doings of the racing sters. Gallicky waggers ponies and pony gigs, and speedy saddle horses of all kinds are shown in pictures with their owners, that will delight the heart of every horse lover. one of the thrilling jumps for which Italian horsemen are famous, and a picture of "Bonnie is the king" of the number, other sports and current topics are not lost sight of. The department, "Woman and her Interests," is full of good things for the ladies, and "Fashions and Summer Frabrics," "Putting Away Furs," "Fashion Notes," and "Dress Reform" are among the articles. Fielding and a number of fashion plates.

MARRIAGES AS MADE.

Sometimes it would seem as if marriages that are not made for love hold better than those which are. Better and more perpetuations are hps, so also—in the disappointments.

People must change; but if they cannot change together, if the one part of which they were young does not outlive into the full warm affection of the grow old-er, then at least let them consider first that they are not to be the victims of a single fit of pity, all the forbearance, all the kindness, all the self-sacrifice of which they are capable, they break it. If it were so worth while—and it is worth while—to keep the faith of marriage, it must be something to be built on a foundation that will outlast the years.

Since people cannot in general be induced to think long before they marry, and the period static, they might at least be brought up to make the best of it afterwards. Men and girls might easily be educated more than they are to regards wedding as something then better behaviour and wives, better husbands, better fathers, better mothers, better citizens, better comrades to one another. Then, if they could not be sure of the love of their youth, they might learn to go about their business with some faint hope of finding it again. Many would fail, be, and, if they had made mistakes, to bear the reluctantly, and to find some good in a bad thing so far as there was dignity in endurance—and perhaps a little more.—Caroline Duer in The Delineator for June.

STATIONARY ENGINEERS' CERTIFICATES.

The Legislature of Ontario at its present session has passed an act respecting stationary engineers in which engineers and employers are classified according to the nature of the operations are that. After the 1st day of July, 1908, no engineer will be entitled to act or to have charge of a stationary steam plant in this province unless he shall have and hold a government certificate. There are provisions for engineers in other provinces and will be granted without the applicant having to pass an examination, which fixes the 20th day of April, 1907, the date on which the act shall come into force. Provision is also made for the licensing of any engineers in Ontario, or a municipality, or a board of trustees may appoint engineers who on the above date were in charge of a steam plant for the generation in Ontario; third, engineers who had at that time served as engineers for not less than not less than two years' experience in charge of a steam plant. Fourth, engineers who possess such examination qualifications as may be prescribed by the Board of Examiners.

Those interested may obtain a copy of the Act and application form for certificates of qualification, The Secretary, Department of Agriculture, Toronto.

WOMEN PAY MORE.

WHY INSURANCE COMPANIES DISCRIMINATE AGAINST THE GENTLE SEX.

Medical examiners of insurance companies say that the reason a woman pays more for the privilege of insuring than a man, is from the fact that women more readily fall victims to indigestion and stomach troubles and the fatal ailments that spring from these causes.

All persons, they say, who have a weakened digestive system and suffer from sick headache, dizzy spells, distress after eating, specks before the eyes, bloating, nervousness, sleeplessness, and the many other symptoms of indigestion, soon lower the tone of the whole system and are most susceptible to a fatal illness.

For curative power in all stomach troubles, nothing else is safe yet effective, nothing else can be thoroughly relied upon to relieve all troubles from indigestion as Mi-o-na. It is unlike any remedy heretofore known and is really one of the valuable discoveries in modern medical science.

It is not the acute attacks that influence the insurance examiners alone but the constant feelings of weakness, headaches, indigestion and stomach troubles—these things, physicians say, kill more people than many more serious diseases.

We absolutely agree that your money will be refunded should you buy a 50c. box of Mi-o-na stomach tablets and not derive benefit from its results. Mi-o-na is sold by druggists everywhere, or will be sent by mail on receipt of price 50c. Booth's Mi-o-na Company, Buffalo, N.Y.

THE CRADLE OF ANGLICANISM

The beginnings of the Anglican church in Ontario are being reviewed with interest. St. Paul's, Fredericksburgh, county of Lennox, has a proud place in history. According to a record by that earnest missionary, Rev. John Langhorn, it was opened on Christmas day, 1791, the first church in the province to be built new from the ground, for the Church of England solely. A year later, among the 1792 baptisms, he has this note: "Divine service was performed for the first time in the new church of St. Warburg's (doubtless meant for St. Werburgh's), Fredericksburgh, on December 18th." This seems to refer to what has since been known as the Lutheran church, and which has been in the possession of the Methodist body for many years. Possibly at an earlier date Mr. Langhorn had a temporary church, for he has this marriage record: "John Davy, widower, of the second township of Catarakwee, called Ernestown, and Sophy Hoffnel, spinster, of the fourth township of Catarakwee, were married in this church by banns this twenty-second day of November, in the year of our Lord 1787."

NEWS NOTES.

The Minister of Education is considering the advisability of legislation to prevent the spread of tuberculosis in the schools.

Dr. Shirres of Montreal was attacked by a bulldog while riding, and so badly bitten that several of his toes will have to be amputated.

The village of Finch was visited by a destructive fire, and two churches, the public library and several stores and dwellings were burned.

The Attorney-General of Quebec, has granted leave to appeal in the case where prosecutions of the Buckingham magistrates were dismissed on account of there being no stamps on the warrants.

Deseronto Lacrosse Club elected these officers: Patrons, H. M. Rathbun, W. J. Maller, E. J. Armitage, H. M. P. Deroche and John Freeman honorary presidents, W. H. Stafford honorary vice president, Thomas A. Stewart; president, James L. Gaslin; first vice president, S. Coulter secretary-treasurer, A. M. Smith.

A terrible murder and suicide occurred at Gananoque, early Monday morning. William Waldie, a respected resident, killed his wife and two children with a hammer, and then cut his throat. His bleed man found the dead bodies. A note was left by Waldie, stating that he had meant at first to kill only himself, but decided to put his wife and children out of the way in order to prevent them being disgraced.

Professor Lanceireaux, a member of the Paris Academy of Medicine, and one of the greatest authorities in France on alcoholism, declares that the abuse of spirituous liquors is responsible for a new variety of tuberculosis. Tuberculosis of the hard drinker develops first, according to Professor Lanceireaux, at the right top of the lung toward the back, whereas ordinary tuberculosis begins at the left top and toward the front of the lung.

Montreal Gazette:—Mr. J. A. Ruddick, the Dominion Dairy Commissioner, writes a letter drawing attention to the unbusinesslike course some cheese factory men are pursuing in selling product before it is properly ripened. It is mentioned, on the authority of an inspector, that in one instance Monday's cheese was boxed and sold on Tuesday. Mr. Ruddick points out the danger to the reputation of the product from such practice, and also makes it clear that, while the buyer may share the blame, the loss in the end will fall on the factorymen. His letter is worthy the consideration of a large number of people it concerns.

SAND STREET.

Very sad indeed was the death of Mrs. Dan. Haley who passed away on Thursday of last week, after an illness of only ten days. Deceased was highly respected by all who knew her, an affectionate wife and mother, and kind neighbor. She will be much missed. Besides her sorrowing husband, she leaves two little children, a boy of two years, and an infant daughter of ten days old. Much sympathy is felt for the bereaved husband and the little ones.

Rev. W. R. Cade had the misfortune to get his ankle badly hurt last week. We are glad to state he is able to be about again.

Mr. J. Loyst is on the sick list.

Miss L. M. Barnhardt, our esteemed teacher's vacant house, speedily licking it up, and on the main part of his farm, rented by Mr. F. M. Joyce. Mr. Joyce has a good field working, and although he raced his horses pretty hard was unable to save anything. In attempting to rescue his horses, he was badly burned about the face and neck. His house, barn, drive house, etc., with contents, were a total loss, including four horses, (one belonging to Geo. T. Ham), fifteen pigs, 3 calves, 200 bushels grain, and quantity of hay. Clothing, furniture, and everything else were destroyed.

The fire then spread to Mr. J. M. Outwater's, and his barn and drive house were destroyed and contents, including several calves.

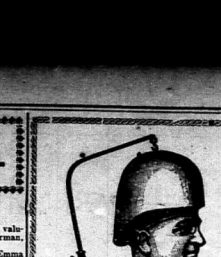
SPECULATION IN WESTERN LANDS.

(From The Canadian Courier.)

It looks as if speculation in Western lands is likely to become less popular this year. For five years it has been most profitable, and the prices have in many cases gone beyond all reason. Land in Edmonton is selling higher than in Toronto. The city has 13,000 inhabitants; the latter 300,000. A reversion is due. The banks will arrest the progress by refusing to lend any more money, and the west was never so short of capital, in comparison to its needs, as it is to-day. Unless all signs fail, land will be always cheaper in many cases two years from to-day than at the present moment.

A smart young man went out to a Western town and started buying and selling lots, dealing only with real estate agents. They were dared backward and forward among them, selling a lot here, buying one there, and the agents will always get something to "boot." In a few days he had ten thousand dollars, and headed back to the East. He played with the fire, but managed to get away before he was burnt up.

Not that the West will stop its progress, of course—only speculation will be hampered. Genuine expansion and development will proceed as usual. The high prices will be simply mean that the furore is being heavily discounted.



A REMARKABLE INVENTION FOR THE Culture of Hair

THE EVANS VACUUM CAP is a practical invention constructed on scientific and hygienic principles by the simple means of which a free and normal circulation is restored throughout the scalp. The minute blood vessels are gently stimulated to activity, thus allowing the food supply which can only be derived from the blood, to be carried to the hair roots, the effects of which are quickly seen in a healthy, vigorous growth of hair. There is no rubbing, and as no drugs or chemicals of whatsoever kind are employed there is nothing to cause irritation. It is only necessary to wear the Cap three or four minutes daily.

60 DAYS' FREE TRIAL.

The Company's Guarantee.

AN EVANS VACUUM CAP will be sent you for sixty days' free trial.—If you do not find it the natural development of a new growth of hair, and are not satisfied that the Cap will completely restore your hair, you are at liberty to return the Cap within sixty days, and the full purchase price will be refunded without question. The price of the Cap to be deposited with the Chancery Lane Safe Deposit Company, who will hold the money until the Cap is returned, and then pay it over to us. We consider we have made a most liberal proposition, and the money will be returned in full, on demand, if you are not entirely satisfied at any time during the trial period.

The eminent Dr. I. N. LOVE, in his address to the Medical Board on the subject of Alopecia (loss of hair) stated that if a steam could be devised to bring nutrition to the hair follicles (hair roots) without resorting to any artificial process, the problem of hair growth would be solved. Later on, when the EVANS VACUUM CUP was submitted to him for inspection, he stated that the principle on which it had been constructed in practise the observations he had previously made before the Medical Board.

Dr. W. MOORE, referring to the invention, says that the principle upon which the Evans Vacuum Cap is founded is absolutely correct and indisputable.

An illustrated and descriptive book of the Evans Vacuum Cap will be sent, post free, on application to

J. ERLE CALDWELL

Passed peacefully away on Thursday, 16th May, after but a brief illness, aged thirty years. Deceased was a resident of Napanee but two years, but in that time he had made a host of friends, who admired him for his consistent life and social and business qualities. As secretary-treasurer of the Napanee Canning Co. he came into contact with a great many persons, especially with those engaged in farming and gardening, and on every hand he was spoken of in highest terms. Last October he contracted a severe cold, which quickly developed into pneumonia, and from which he never recovered. About the middle of November last, he went to Calgary, Alberta, and there spent the winter. For a time there was improvement in his health, but it was not permanent, and growing worse, he returned home a few weeks ago, conscious that his end was near, and fully prepared to go. All that a loving mother, father and sisters could do to relieve his suffering and make his last hours happy, was done. His friend, Dr. Ralph Quay, was especially kind and thoughtful, and accompanied him from California. He was a son of the late Miles Caldwell, Belleville, and leaves a bereaved mother, Mrs. W. A. Carson, and a step-father, to mourn the loss of one who was everything that could be desired in a son and brother. Mr. and Mrs. Carson and daughters have the sincerest sympathy of the whole community. The funeral will be private. The remains will be taken from the house at 12.30 on Saturday to the G. T. R. station, and interred in the family plot at Belleville.

THE LATE D. E. ROSE.

On Sunday morning, May 12th, the Village of Tamworth lost one of its best citizens in Mr. D. E. Rose. Sometime in the later sixties he came to the village, and began in a quiet way his part in its social and business life. That part he continued with increasing interest and influence until his death.

He was married in 1871 to Miss Harriet McKim, daughter of Mr. Peter McKim, of Kingston. They began their wedded life as earnest Christians, taking part in the work of their church, and always ready to help any good cause. While ever attentive to his business and prosperity, he was always liberal in aid of other interests, and enjoyed also the good gifts of God as they were going. Their home life was one of the most enjoyable, and they were ever ready to entertain their friends, or care for the travelling minister on his frequent calls. He had a share in every part of his church's work, leading the choir for nearly thirty years, for many a year he was Superintendent of the Sunday School, and leader of a class. Often he represented his church at District meetings and Conference, and was a representative to the General Conference of 1902 and 1906, but was prevented going to the latter by the illness of his wife.

His was that patient type of Christian fortitude, that if one day failed was ready to take up another, and to the last he bore with unwavering patience the difficulties he met. Always ready to help others and thoughtful of their interests, he made hosts of friends, as was manifested by the crowds that gathered at his funeral. His last days were spent in bright, calm Christian faith, and he died without murmur or struggle. His pastor preached from Psalms 116, 15, dwelling on the worth of Christian example and the influence of a faithful life. His widow and two sons have a sweet memory and a bright example left them, to be their comfort on the journey to the better life. On Tuesday, 14th May, his remains were laid in the family plot in the Eastern cemetery, Napanee.

A CLERGYMAN DEAD.

Rev. Thomas H. Richards, a Methodist clergyman at Inverary, died Tuesday night, from a complication of diseases, superinduced by pneumonia. He had been ill for some time, but continued work until Thursday when he was compelled to keep his room. He sank rapidly. Deceased was fifty-seven years of age, and was a good pastor and an earnest preacher.

A wife, a daughter of Mr. Jas. Joyce, North Fredericksburgh, and two daughters, Miss Pearl and Miss Mabel, are left to mourn a devoted and kind husband and father and affectionate father. A brother of deceased resides in California, and two sisters and a brother in England.

Miss Mabel Richards, who attended Queen's during the past two sessions was teaching at Mountain Grove, but only reached her father's bedside in time to be recognized by his fellowmen.

Mr. Richards was completing his third year on Inverary circuit and had been invited to return a fourth year. He entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal church in 1873 and went into the union in 1884.

NAPANEE WATER POWER TO BE DEVELOPED.

For some time past a rumor has been on the street that Messrs. J. R. Dafoe and W. T. Waller had secured a lease of the water power of the Cartwright canal, and would repair the walls and develop the power to its full capacity.

In an interview with Messrs. Dafoe and Waller the rumor was confirmed and we are permitted to give the public the following:

Messrs. Dafoe and Waller will first put the canal in first class condition and thereby double the capacity of the canal, and will install an up to date electric power plant to supply power for manufacturing purposes at a very low rate per horse power, and have already in prospect some manufacturing plants to be established here. They have also submitted an offer to the Town Council of Napanee to furnish current for the town plant for from one to two thousand dollars per year less than it is now costing to run the town plant.

This in itself is of great importance to the ratepayers of Napanee, and the Messrs. Dafoe and Waller will call a public meeting for Friday evening, the 31st inst., to have the matter brought before the people and afford them an opportunity to discuss the matter, and also to afford Messrs. Dafoe and Waller an opportunity to state to the public what they have to offer them.

This is what the people of Napanee have been wanting for years, to have this valuable water power developed, and in the hands of such well known business men as Messrs. Dafoe and Waller, we feel assured that if the citizens of Napanee will give a little encouragement, our town is on the eve of a big first boom and brighter times are in store for it.

The promoters of the above have signified a wish to have every ratepayer if possible attend the public meeting and any information asked for will be cheerfully furnished.

HISTORICAL.

Napanee, May 24th, 1907.

The Lennox and Addington Historical Society has been organized for the purpose of collecting manuscripts, maps, books, letters and other matter of historic interest, in order that these documents may be properly cared for. Everything received will be properly acknowledged by the donors, or in case of a loan the lender's name will be attached to the documents in appropriate form.

We wish to furnish our room in a liberal style as far as possible, and with that idea in view, will purchase a number of Colonial chairs, tables, stands, drawers, a mahogany, if the price is reasonable. Should any of our citizens desire to present the Society with pieces of furniture of the above description, they will be gratefully remembered.

Please consider this as a personal appeal and do what you can for the advancement of letters in this district. Many valuable papers have been destroyed. We trust that with a proper place to preserve them the people will avail themselves of its advantages.

Very respectfully yours,
CLARANCE M. WARNER,
President.

Secretary.

DIED AT KEEWATIN, ONT., WAS BORN AT TAMWORTH, ONT.

Died at Keewatin, on Monday, 1st April, 1907, John G. Wormworth, at the age of 37 years. Mr. Wormworth was suffering from an attack of pleurisy, and came from Ignace, Ont., to the home of his wife's parents, Mr. and Mrs. John Gault, to be near medical treatment, and was apparently doing well, no serious consequences being feared but on Monday evening he was taken away in a few minutes.

Deceased was six years operator at Keewatin, C.P.R. station, and while there made many friends by his quiet unassuming manner and a genial individuality all his own. His sterling worth was recognized by the railway Company, and five years ago he was appointed station agent at Whitemouth. He performed his duties in that position so satisfactorily that a little over six months ago, he was transferred to Ignace, where as agent he held one of the most important posts on the division of the Canadian Pacific Railway. His funeral took place on Tuesday, being in charge of Minnetonka Lodge No. 292, I.O.O.F., of which he was a honored member, the brethren attending in a body. There was also a large attendance of others, including railway men from along the line. The floral tributes which were profuse, covered the coffin, included the following among others: cross and crown, Mrs. Wormworth; wreath Mr. and Mrs. John Gault; wreath, Baseball Club and station staff of Whitemouth; wreath, brethren railway Telegraphers; wreath, station staff of Ignace; wreath, station staff at Keewatin; the remains were interred in Lake of the Woods cemetery. Deceased left his wife and three small children, Reginald Margaret and Herbert, to mourn his untimely last passage. A mother and sister, of Tamworth, Ont., and four brothers, of Dexter, N.Y.; Herbert, of Dawson City; T. D. Scriver, of Newburgh, and Frank W., of Arden.

Don't be fooled by Oriental Fancy Names. Campbell's Varnish Stain is the original and only satisfactory colored varnish on the market. No mystery about it. Just the best varnish and suitable colors. Nothing equal to it for Floors, Furniture, and Woodwork. T. B. Wallace sells it.

One Ingredient of Zutoo
Is soda—just old-fashioned soda, that our grandmothers took to settle the stomach.

The principal ingredient—the one that stops the headache, is a vegetable ingredient, imported for us from Japan. It wont hurt you any more than will the soda.

The other ingredients of Zutoo are just as harmless.

If you knew what the drug cures contain, and their ultimate effect on the system, you would discard them at once and take Zutoo, which is harmless as Soda.

IMPORTANCE OF BEING EARNEST.

Visitors to Toronto during the second week of the races will have the opportunity of witnessing the Press Club's annual theatrical performance at the Princess Theatre. This year "The Importance of Being Earnest" is being produced, preceded by "Grin goire, the ballad-monger." The former is an intensely satirical comedy, based on the foibles of English society life, while the curtain raiser is a skit on events connected with the life of Louis XI of France. Mr. Douglas A. Patterson, who had a long experience on the American stage with Henry Miller, is directing the production, and the chief parts are taken by Robert Stuart Pigott, also an actor of international repute. The leading female part has been assigned to Miss Berenice Parker, and the other roles are equally well filled. The productions of the past two years have given the Press Club a high standing in theatre-going circles and Toronto society now turns out in full force for the show. The dates are May 30th and 31st, and June 1st.

The meeting was addressed by Mr. S. J. Thompson of Brantford, on the work of the Society in general, and the chairman spoke at some length on the work of the Napanee branch. After considerable discussion, it was on motion of Mr. T. H. Johnston, seconded by Mrs. Gibbard, decided to hold a meeting in the Town Hall, next Tuesday evening, at the close of the public meeting to be addressed by Mr. Thompson, on the election of officers for the ensuing year.

PUBLIC MEETING

A fair and appreciative audience greeted Mr. S. M. Thompson, the popular agent of the Children's Aid Society, at the Town Hall, on Tuesday night. Mr. Thomson has been connected with the Society for a number of years, is a fluent speaker, and explained the object and workings of this worthy institution fully and feelingly.

Mr. S. Gibson, President of the local Society, presided. The lecturer added greatly to the interest of his subject by showing with limelight pictures some of the children taken up by the Society during the past few years under the condition when received at the shelter, and later in their new homes.

CHILDREN'S AID SOCIETY.

The Child's Protection Act of Ontario was passed in 1893. Mr. Kelso, of Toronto, was appointed the first Superintendent, an office which he still holds with credit to himself and the lasting benefit of the Province. At first it was difficult and up-hill to work to get people to take hold of the work with enthusiasm enough to stay with it and make a success of it, but during the last year or two a greater interest and more activity are now shewn than ever before. There are now sixty-four societies throughout the Province, which have rescued 1,000 children from homes of wickedness, where their training was all of the worst kind, leading only to a criminal life. Three thousand of these children are still under supervision; the others are grown up young men and women. Many are married and in their own homes. All or almost all are doing well, leading respectable and honorable lives, fulfilling their duties as citizens and sharing the burdens and responsibilities of citizenship.

Mr. Kelso's hands have been greatly strengthened during the past year or so by the appointment of Mr. Bernard Hall, as Inspector for the Province, and is thus kept in closer touch with the local societies, aiding and assisting them in any troublesome and intricate cases that may arise.

The Napanee branch have conducted their work in a very quiet and unostentatious manner, nevertheless good work has been accomplished, but little less than twenty-five children have been taken from evil surroundings, where the influences were all for wickedness. These children have been placed in good homes in different parts of the Province, and good reports are received of them from time to time. There is one thing in this work, though children may be removed from their evil influences and surroundings, a close supervision and record is always kept of them, from our knowledge of the parent each has been already accomplished, and the energy, zeal and enterprising methods now being adopted in the furtherance of the cause, cannot fail to prove a source of lasting benefit.

We trust our readers will give the matter attention and help in some way this great work for the good of the little people. Write the Secretary and tell him what you will do for them, or if you do not know in what way you can best help, write him and he will tell you. SCIENCE PREVENTS BALDNESS.

The Fatal Germ and Its Remedy Now Facts of Science.

It is the rarest thing in the world for a man to be necessarily bald. No man whose hair is not dead at the roots, need be bald if he will use Newbro's Herpicide, the new scalp antiseptic. Herpicide destroys the germ that eats the hair off at the root; and cleans the scalp of dandruff and leaves it in a perfectly healthy condition. Mr. Mannett, in the Maryland Block, Butte, Mont., was entirely bald. In less than a month Herpicide had removed the enemies of hair growth, and nature did the work by covering his head with thick hair an inch long; and in six weeks he had a normal growth of hair. THE MASQUERADER

By Katherine Cecil Thurston, author of "The Circle."

In the five days of banishment just lived through the need for a readjustment of his position with regard to her had come to him forcibly. The memory of the night when weakness and he had been at perilously close quarters had returned to him persistently and uncomfortably, spoiling the remembrance of its triumph. It had been well enough to smother the thought of that night in days of work. But had the ignoring of it blotted out the weakness? Had it not rather thrown it into bolder relief? A man strung in his own strength does not turn his back upon temptation. He faces and quells it. In the solitary days that he had been at pertinacity close quarters had returned to him persistently and uncomfortably, spoiling the remembrance of its triumph. It had been well enough to smother the thought of that night in days of work. But had the ignoring of it blotted out the weakness? Had it not rather thrown it into bolder relief? A man strung in his own strength does not turn his back upon temptation. He faces and quells it. In the solitary days in Clifford's inn, in the solitary night hours spent in tramping the city streets, this had been the conviction that had recurred again and again, this the problem to which, after much consideration, he had found a solution, satisfactory at least to himself. When next Chilcote called him— It was notable that he had used the word "when" and not "if." When next Chilcote called him he would make a new departure. He would no longer avoid Eve. He would successfully prove to himself that one interest and one close filled his mind—the pursuance of Chilcote's political career. So does man satisfactorily convince himself against himself. He had this intention fully in mind as he came forward now.

"Well," he said slowly, "has it been very hard to have faith these last five days?" It was not precisely the tone he had meant to adopt, but one must begin.

Eve turned at his words. Her eyes were brimming with life, her cheeks still touched to a deep, soft color by the keenness of the wintry air.

"No," she answered, with a shy, responsive smile of confidence. "I seemed to keep on believing. You know converts make the best devotees." She laughed with slight embarrassment and glanced up at him. Something in the line of her eyes reminded him unpleasantly of spring skies—full of youth and promise.

He moved abruptly and crossed the room toward the window. "I need," he said, without looking around, "I want your help."

He heard the faint rustling of her dress as she turned toward him, and he knew that he had struck the right chord. All true women responded to an appeal for aid as steel answers to the magnet. He could feel her expectancy in the silence.

"You know—we all know—that the present moment is very vital. That it's impossible to deny the crisis in the affairs

"Eve," he said, "I want your help."

of this country. I—I am not a coward. Nobody feels it more than I do. Nobody is more exorbitantly keen to have a share, a part, when the real fight comes"— He stopped; then he turned slowly and their eyes met. "If a man is to succeed in such a desire," he went on deliberately, "he must exclude all others. He must have, for one purpose, one interest, one thought. He must forget that"—

Eve lifted her head quickly—"that he has a wife," she finished gently. "I think I understand."

There was no annoyance in her face or voice, no suggestion of selfishness or of hurt vanity. She had read his meaning with disconcerting clearness and responded with disconcerting generosity. A sudden and very human dissatisfaction with his readjustment scheme fell upon Loder. Opposition is the whip to action; a too ready acquiescence the shackled rein.

"Did I say that?" he asked quickly. The tone was almost Chilcote's.

She glanced up; then a sudden, incomprehensible smile lighted up her face.

"You didn't say, but you thought," she answered gravely. "Thoughts are the same as words to a woman. That's why we are so unreasonable." Again she smiled. Some idea, baffling and incomprehensible to Loder, was stirring in her mind.

Conscious of the impression, he moved still nearer. "You jump to conclusions," he said abruptly. "What I meant to imply"—

"—was precisely what I've understood," she finished in his sentence. Then she laughed softly. "How very wise, but how very, very foolish men are! They come to the conclusion that because a woman is—is interested in you she is going to hamper you in some direction, and after infinite pains you summon all your tact and you set about saving the situation." There was interest, even a touch of amusement, in her tone; her eyes were still fixed upon his in an indefinable glance. "You think you are being very diplomatic," she went on quietly, "but in reality you are being very transparent. The woman reads the whole of your meaning in your very first sentence—if she hasn't known it before you began to speak."

Again Loder made an interruption, but again she checked him.

"No," she said, still smiling. "You should never attempt such a task. Shall I tell you why?"

He stood silent, puzzled and interested.

"Because," she said quickly, "when a woman really is interested, the man's career ranks infinitely higher in her eyes than any personal desire for power."

For a moment their eyes met; then abruptly Loder looked away. She had gauged his intentions incorrectly, yet with disconcerting insight. Again the suggestion of an unusual personality below the serenity of her manner recurred to his imagination.

With an impulse altogether foreign to him he lifted his head and again met her glance. Then at last he spoke, but only two words. "Forgive me!" he said, with simple directness.

CHAPTER XXII.

AFTER his interview with Eve, Loder retired to the study and spent the remaining hours of the day and the whole span of the evening in work. At 1 o'clock, still feeling fresh in mind and body, he dismissed Greening and passed into Chilcote's bedroom. The interview with Eve, though widely different from the one he had anticipated, had left him stimulated and alert. In the hours that followed it there had been an added anxiety to put his mind into harness, an added gratification in finding it answer to the rein.

A pleasant sense of retrospection settled upon him as he slowly undressed, and a pleasant sense of interest touched him as, crossing to the dressing table, he caught sight of Chilcote's engagement book, taken with other things from the suit he had changed at dinner time and carefully laid aside by Renwick.

He picked it up and slowly turned the pages. It always held the suggestion of a lottery, this dipping into another man's engagements and drawing a prize or a blank. It was a sensation that even custom had not dulled.

At first he turned the pages idly, but then by degrees his fingers quickened. Beyond the fact that this present evening was free he knew nothing of his promised movements. The abruptness of Chilcote's arrival at Clifford's inn in the afternoon had left no time for superfluous questions. He skimmed the writing with a touch of interested haste, then all at once he paused and smiled.

"Big enough for a tombstone!" he said below his breath as his eyes rested on a large blue cross. Then he smiled again and held the book to the light.

"Dine 33 Cadogan gardens, 8 o'c. Talk with L.," he read, still speaking softly to himself.

He stood for a moment pondering on the entry, then once more his glance reverted to the cross.

"Evidently meant it to be seen," he mused. "But why the deuce isn't he more explicit?" As he spoke a look of comprehension suddenly crossed his face and the puzzled frown between his eyebrows cleared away.

With a feeling of satisfaction he remembered Lakeley's frequent and pressing suggestion that he should dine with him at Cadogan gardens and discuss the political outlook.

Lakeley must have written during his absence, and Chilcote, having skimmed the engagement, felt no further responsibility. The invitation could scarcely have been verbal, as Chilcote, he knew, had lain very low in the five days of his return home.

So he argued as he stood with the book still open in his hands, the blue cross staring imperatively from the white paper. And from the argument rose thoughts and suggestions that seethed in his mind long after the lights had been switched off, long after the fire had died down, and he had been left wrapped in darkness in the great canopied bed.

And so it came about that he took his second false step. Once during the press of the next morning's work it crossed his mind to verify his convictions by a glance at the directory, but for once the strong wish that evolves a thought conquered his action. His work was absorbing; the need of verification seemed very small. He let the suggestion pass.

At 7 o'clock he dressed carefully. His mind was full of Lakeley and of the possibilities the night might hold; for more than once before the weight of the St. George's Gazette, with Lakeley at its back, had turned the political scales. To be marked by him as a coming man was at any time a favorable portent; to be singled out by him at the present juncture was momentous. A thrill of expectancy, almost boyish, pervaded him as he looked at his surveyed his appearance preparatory to leaving the house.

Passing downstairs, he moved at once to the hall door; but almost as his hand touched it he halted, attracted by a movement on the landing above him. Turning, he saw Eve.

She was standing quite still, looking down upon him as she had looked once before. As their eyes met she changed her position hastily.

"You are going out?" she asked. And it struck Loder quickly that there was a suggestion, a shadow of disappointment in the tone of her voice. Moved by the impression, he responded with unusual promptness.

"Yes," he said. "I'm dining out—dining with Lakeley."

She watched him intently while he spoke; then, as the meaning of his words reached her her whole face brightened.

"With Mr. Lakeley?" she said. "Oh, I'm glad—very glad. It is quite—quite another affair." She smiled with a warm, impulsive touch of sympathy.

Loder, looking up at her, felt his loneliness within and his own secret craving for success quickened to stronger life. The man whose sole income was within my go forward coldly and successfully; but the man who grasps a double inspiration, who, even unconsciously, is impelled by another force, has a stronger impetus for attack, a surer, more vital bewing power. Still watching her, he answered instinctively:

"Yes," he said slowly, "a long step." And, with a smile of farewell, he turned, opened the door and passed into the road.

The thrill of that one moment was still warm as he reached Cadogan gardens and mounted the steps of No. 33—so vitally warm that he paused for an instant before pressing the electric bell. Then at last, dominated by asticism, he turned and raised the hand.

The action was abrupt, and it was only as his fingers pressed the bell that a certain impetuousness, a certain want of suitability in the aspect of the house, struck him. The door was white; the handle and knocker were of massive silver. The first seemed a disappointing index of Lakeley's private taste, the second a ridiculous temptation to needy humanity. He looked again at the number of the house, but it stared back at him convincingly. Then the door opened.

So keen was his sense of unfitness that, still trying to fuse his impression of Lakeley with the idea of silver door fittings, he stepped into the hall without the usual preliminary question. Suddenly realizing the necessity, he turned to the servant, but the man forestalled him:

"Will you come into the white room, sir? And may I take your coat?"

The smooth certainty of the man's manner surprised him. It held another savor of disappointment, seeming as little in keeping with the keen, businesslike Lakeley as did the house. Still struggling with his impression, he allowed himself to be relieved of his hat and coat and in silence ushered up the shallow staircase.

As the last step was reached it came to him again to mention his host's name, but simultaneously with the suggestion the servant stepped forward with a quick, silent movement and threw open a door.

"Mr. Chilcote!" he announced in a subdued, discreet voice.

Loder's first impression was of a room that seemed unusually luxurious, soft and shadowed. Then all impression of inanimate things left him suddenly.

For the fraction of a second he stood in the doorway, while the room seemed emptied of everything except a figure that rose slowly from a couch before the fire at sound of Chilcote's name. Then, with a calmness that to himself seemed incredible, he moved forward into the room.

He might, of course, have beaten a retreat and obviated many things, but life is full of might have beens, and retreat never presents itself agreeably to a strong man. His impulse was to face the difficulty, and he acted on the impulse.

Lillias had risen slowly, and as he neared her she held out her hand.

"Jack," she exclaimed softly, "how sweet of you to remember!"

The voice and words came to him with great distinctness, and as they came one, uncertainly passed forever the last shred—the question as to what relation she and Chilcote held to each other. With the realization came the thought of Eve, and in the midst of his own difficulty his face hardened.

Lillian ignored the coldness. Taking his hand, she said, with a touch of childly punctual," she said. "But your hands are cold. Come closer to the fire."

Loder was not sensible that his hands were cold, but he suffered himself to be led to the fire.

One end of the couch was in firelight, the other in shadow. By a fortunate arrangement of chance Lillian selected the brighter end for herself and offered the other to her guest. With a quick sense of respite he accepted it. At least he could sit secure from detection while he temporized with fate.

For a moment they sat silent, then Lillian uttered. "Won't you smoke?" she asked.

Everything in the room seemed soft and unerring—the cushions, the glow of the fire, the smell of roses that hung about the air and, last of all, Lillian's slow, soothing voice. With a touch of oppression he stiffened his shoulders and sat straighter in his place.

"No," he said, "I don't think I shall smoke."

She moved nearer to him. "Dear Jack," she said pleadingly, "don't if you're in a bad mood. Don't say you want to postpone again." She looked up at him and laughed a little in mock consternation.

Loder was at a loss.

Another silence followed, while Lillian waited; then she frowned suddenly and rose from the couch. Like many indolent people, she showed a touch of obstinacy, and now that her trium, b over Chilcote was obtained, able portent; to be singled out by him at the present juncture was momentous. A thrill of expectancy, almost boyish, pervaded through him as he surveyed his appearance preparatory to leaving the house.

Passing downstairs, he moved at once to the hall door; but almost as his hand touched it he halted, attracted by a movement on the landing above him. Turning, he saw Eve.

A RHEUMATIC WRECK.

AFTER HOSPITAL TREATMENT FAILED DR. WILLIAMS' PINK PILLS CURED HIM.

"I suffered the greatest agony from rheumatism. Leading physicians prescribed many medicines, but with unsatisfactory results. I was finally advised to go to a hospital, but even the treatment there failed. Then I took Dr. Williams' Pink Pills and to-day I am a well man."

These words were spoken by Clifford L. Forbes when interviewed at Aspy, N.S. Mr. Forbes is a fisherman and had always been very healthy, until some three years ago while fishing off Newfoundland he was seized with a very severe attack of rheumatism. In his own words he says, "I was fishing on the Grand Banks in the spring of 1903 when I was stricken with rheumatism. I could not work for three months and was entirely unbearable. My case became so serious that I had to be landed and for weeks I lay in a Cape Breton hospital as helpless as a cripple. The hospital doctors prescribed different remedies, but they did not cure me. I then left the hospital and was taken home with rheumatism apparently completely fastened upon me. Day and night I suffered. Nothing I did for the trouble seemed to help me and I became despondent and downhearted. Then a friend advised me to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills. I was skeptical, but my friend praised the pills so highly that I determined to try them, with the result you see to-day. I am fully cured and have not since had even a twinge of that dreaded affliction. I cannot say too much in favor of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills and I urge all rheumatic sufferers to try them."

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills cured Mr. Forbes because they struck straight at the blood and made of it a rich, healthy blood. They don't act on the bowels. They do only one thing, but they do it well—they actually make new blood. In that way they root out all common blood diseases like rheumatism, neuralgia, backache, rheumatism, sciatica, neuralgia, and the secret ailments of girls and women who suffer unspeakable from the sickness and irregularity of their blood becomes disturbed. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are sold by all dealers in medicine, or sent by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50, by writing The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

AN EARNEST APPEAL.

We gladly publish the following article in "The Canadian Mail", published at the Institute for the Deaf and Dumb, at Belleville, Ont.:

We have reason to believe that there is a considerable number of deaf children in this Province of school age who are not attending our Institution, but who should be doing so. We are desirous of obtaining the names and addresses of the parents of all such children, and we earnestly appeal to the readers of these lines to assist us in securing this information. Clergymen of all denominations, physicians, assessors, inspectors of schools and public school teachers are in an especially favorable position to assist us in this direction, and by so doing they would be conferring an inestimable boon to these silent members of the community. Our desire is to enter into correspondence with the parents of all deaf children with the hope of inducing them to send them to our school, Belleville, where they may receive such training and instruction as will fit them to become useful, self-supporting and respected citizens. It is a lamentable thing that any deaf boy or girl should be deprived of the advantages of such an education when it is freely provided for them by the people of the Province. We earnestly hope the newspapers throughout Ontario will call attention to this matter as emphatically as possible and thus aid in this good work.

For the Children

To succeed these days you must have plenty of grit, courage, strength. How is it with the children? Are they thin, pale, delicate? Do not forget Ayer's Sarsaparilla. You know it makes the blood pure and rich, and builds up the general health in every way.

The children cannot possibly have good health unless the bowels are in order. Give them, once a week, a gentle dose of Ayer's Pills. All vegetable, sugar-coated.

Napanee's Greatest Store

A Series of Dress Goods Sales

Commencing May 25th.

This store's business is growing larger every week. Such a store as this that has grown to be a public utility does not need to trouble itself about the future, provided we live up to the high ideal we set for ourselves to follow years ago. No untruthful or misleading assertion appears in our advertisements, we tell you straight facts, and when we advertise special sales you have come to know for a surety that there is a saving for you.

Ladies who are anxious to see the very latest turn styles have taken are studying our Dress Department. For Saturday and next week this department is having a series of bargain days as follows:

Saturday, May 25th.

We will sell our entire stock of one dollar Lion and Crown Tweeds for 65c per yd. In this lot you will find many desirable patterns in nice light grey and green effects. Note the width 54 inches. Come early and get your share.

Wednesday and Thursday, May 29th and 30th.

SALE OF SILKS—Our regular 75c Silks in checks, overchecks and stripes, suitable for shirt waist suits and waists. Every pattern the type of perfection. Sale Price, 58c yd.

Monday and Tuesday, May 27th and 28th.

We place on sale our extra fine new stripe Suitings. These are the correct design and are good value at $1.75 per yd., but on the above dates they are yours at only $1.25 per yd.

Friday, May 31st.

A SPECIAL LINE OF MOHAIR SERGE ON SALE—This material is 42 inches wide. Very suitable for shirt waist suits and coats and skirts. The regular price is 75c yd. On Friday our clearing price is 48c yd.

OUR GUARANTEED BLACK TAFFETA SILK.

We need scarcely make mention of this material. We have just received a repeat order of four hundred yards. The guarantee of the maker is on the selvedge edge of every yard. Our price, $1.00 per yard.

Men's Clothing--Shirts, "Straws", Hosiery, Underwear, Hats, Neckwear.

Robinson's shall become more an l more a man's store, where men come relying on style, quality, and price being right. Styles are drawn from authentic sources. Quality is high because the service is expert. Prices are fair because we have "one price to all." And over all is The Robinson Co. Guarantee that insures satisfaction or the cheerful refund of the money—at the customers option.

Sale of Men's Shirts--75c for Men's $1.00 to $1.50 Shirts.

Short Lots—Samples.

Most of these are the samples of The Crescent Mfg. Co. Some are from our own stock—odd lots and some a trifle soiled. Men have this excellent chance to stock up for the summer in up-to-date negligee shirts. Come and make a selection. The least saving is a third and that by itself would be remarkable. SALE BEGINS SATURDAY MORNING, MAY 25th. It's because the lots consist of maker's samples and of short remainder stocks.

Merchant Tailoring.

You know Robinson Co. Tailoring is good. Never have we had such a tailoring business. We stint nothing that will aid in making you a good suit, and that will give you satisfaction and that you will be proud to wear.

Blue and Black Serge Suits—A Special—We have a line of goods that we bought at less than usual price. Suits are regularly worth $24.50. While these pieces last we will make them $21.00.

Men's New Straw Hats.

Note latitude for choice in men's straw hats this season. There's an absence of "freak" shapes. Men may wear whichever style best pleases, but the preference is for the soft Leghorns and Panamas. Small shapes are the style for city wear, but are not as serviceable for the average person as the wider leaf. Prices from 25c up to $2.50. Some special values in boys' and children's Straw Hats at from 20c to 50c each.

Linen Hats and Land and Water Hats for men and boys. Be sure and see them.

Boys' Furnishings.

There's a well equipped section of our Men's Furnishing Department devoted to outfitting boys. Being under the same head, the styles are kept right up-to-date, and have the "grown-up" air that boys like in toggery.

Boy's Negligee Shirts and Shirt Waists are a specialty. Such a wide, wide range as we show will surprise you. Everything that is new is here.

ANOTHER SALE OF VEILING

Tuesday, May 28th, 10 Cents a Yard.

A few weeks ago we had a one day sale of Veilings. We did not have enough to supply the call. Ever since we have been on the look for an equal value. We found about twenty-five pieces. Regular prices, 25c, 35c and 40c a yard. We will pass them on to you, 10 cents a yard. All new, up to date Veilings such as nets with chenille spots, brown, black, green. Chiffon Veilings in black, white, blue and white, red. If you order by mail send postage about 2 cents a yard. Time, 10 o'clock a.m.

This is headquarters for the sale of Men's Working Clothes. The Manufacturers tell us that there is no retail store outside of the larger cities that buy as many overalls as we do. Result is naturally that we can dictate to the makers how they shall be made, and also get the benefit of any special prices that are going. Just think of buying six and seven hundred dollars worth of overalls at a time. Is it any wonder that we get the best there is going. All regular lines in stock at from 50c to $1.00.

BEAUTY OF GRATITUDE
FAILURE TO APPRECIATE DAILY BLESSINGS IS A COMMON SIN.
THANKFULNESS IS OUR DUTY
On Life's Journey Many Kindnesses Are Needed—Too Often They Are Soon Forgotten — Thanksgiving Is Neglected — Story of the Lepers — Joyful Service the Highest Form of Praise.

Entered according to Act of Parliament of Canada, in the year one Thousand Nine Hundred and Seven, at the Dept. of Agriculture, Ottawa.

Los Angeles, Cal., May 12—In this sermon the preacher calls attention to the universally prevalent sin of ingratitude, as shown in our lack of appreciation of the many blessings that come into our daily lives. The text is Luke xvii. 15, "And one of them, when he saw that he was healed, turned back and with a loud voice glorified God."

Travelers tell us that in one of the mountainous districts of Switzerland a train range and to go from one part of this state to the other you must climb those mountains. The upward pathway bends and winds, now overarched by trees, now under the shadow of some overhanging cliff, but still onward and upward. The weary traveler, panting and perspiring, is too exhausted to look back and see the beautiful valley he has left behind. He keeps saying to himself, "Oh, if I were only at the top, then the rest of my journey would be easy." Suddenly the trees ahead of him abruptly cease and instead of overtopping branches he sees the blue sky rimming the top of the mountain. With a final spurt he reaches the top. There, much to his surprise, upon the summit he finds a rude bench of stone upon which has been carved these words, "Rest and be thankful." He, traveler, rest and be thankful that the hardest part of your toilsome journey is over. But alas not and be thankful because some good kind brother has made you the stone bench upon which you can rest your weary limbs and aching back. If the time should ever come when you can meet that thoughtful brother who made that seat and chiseled on the stone those words of yonder mountain, tell him how much his work was appreciated. Tell him that the bench of stone not only gave you physical rest but that his words reminded you of a duty.

How much harder our lot would be if there were not many people considerate and kind to weary travelers on life's journey! Some people take the kindness even while others need the admonition, "Be thankful."

An American art student in Paris tells of meeting his landress at some distance from home with her basket upon her arm. She was going to the bakery to get her rolls and bread for the day. He asked her, "Why do you go so far for your bread every day? Does the baker where you live not make better bread than any other baker in Paris?" "No," answered the woman, "he does not make better bread. The reason I cross the Seine every day to buy my bread at monsieur's is because a few years ago my husband was thrown out of work, and I was very sick. We had no money in the house, yet for weeks this baker trusted us, and kept us supplied with bread. I did not beg for his goodness my husband and children might have starved. As he cared for us when we had nothing, I must not forget his kindness now that we have much. To be thankful means to be thoughtful." That month so to train our grateful memories that we will never forget the kindness of those who have helped us in the dark days of our struggle.

The hero of my text is a "thankful" man, a "thoughtful" man, a man who would not if he could and could not if he would forget the priceless blessing which Jesus had conferred upon him. For years this man had been a social outcast. He was a repulsive, loathsome leper. His father and mother had turned against him. His brothers and sisters had fled from him as they would from a mad dog. His wife and children, if he had a wife and children, had deserted him. With sticks and stones he had been driven forth from the habitations of man. One day, with nine other lepers with whom he was associating, he stood upon the hillside and saw Jesus and the multitudes passing by. By the strange law of the leper world, which gathers information from every source, these ten lepers learned that it was Jesus, the miracle worker. So these ten lepers begin to cry out at the top of their voices for divine help. Again and again they call, "Jesus, Master, have mercy on us!" Christ turns toward them, as he always turns at the call for help, and practically says: "Yes, I will cure you of your horrible infectious disease. Go show yourselves unto the priests." "And it came to pass that as they went they were cleansed."

No sooner did this leper of my text feel the scales drop off his body and the blood of health course through his veins than at once he cried: "I am well! I am well! I must go back at once and thank the Lord for what he has done for me." And one of them, when he saw that he was healed, turned back and with a loud voice glorified God and fell down on his face at his feet, giving him thanks, and he was a Samaritan." We respect that man, and we have a poor opinion of those other nine who went on without giving thanks. But the incidents has a lesson for us. We have received many blessings from God. Are we like the cleansed Jewish lepers who went forward ungratefully or like the Samaritan who "turned back and glorified God?"

Like the cleansed leper of my text, let us thank God for our physical health. Let us thank God that we have food enough to eat. More than this, let us thank God for a good digestion with which to eat food. How many of us who have perfect health forget to thank God for a good pair of lungs and for steady nerves and for a regular heart, for good teeth, for good eyes and a good pair of legs upon which to walk! How many of us omit to thank God when we get up in the morning that the joints of our bodies do not squeak on account of rheumatism, like an old rusty hinge which has not been moved for many years! When we go to bed at night, do we thank God for the fact that we can get there to sleep and not have to toss hour after hour until midnight we cannot endure the suffering any more and we have to arise and light the gas and go to reading in order to distract our irritating thoughts? In other words, do we thank God that we have health and strength? Too often we neglect to do so until we have learned by pain and suffering the blessings we have lost. You who have suffered like my self from dyspepsia or like scores and hundreds of us who have passed through years of pain and weakness then you can now say I put the blessing of physical health in the forefront of this sermon.

Have you never by personal experience been able to picture the distress of that poor leper of my text before he was compelled to confess himself a loathsome leper, even his wife, I have sometimes imagined him one of the stalwart men of the east? I have imagined him grow a healthy boy, a healthy young man, and then marry. He has a beautiful home, a dear wife and a couple of lovely children. All that is possible to make a young man's life happy is his. But one day while taking a bath he sees a little white spot on the skin of his left shoulder. He does not think much of it at first. He tries to rub it away, but it will not rub off. Then in a week or two he sees that this small white spot is growing a little larger. He tries to massage it with a rough towel, but is will not rub out. Now he begins to think seriously about it. His face takes on a worried look. He does not tell anyone, even his wife. Now he cannot sleep well at night. He becomes cross and irritable. One night his wife misses him from her side. She gets up to find out where he is gone. She finds him in the next room bending over the sleeping children. He is weeping and wringing his hands, saying, "Oh, who will look after these children after I am gone?" "What is the matter, husband?" she says. "You are not going to leave the babies, are you? Is anything the matter?" He says, "Nothing, nothing," for he dare not tell her the truth. Then he feels himself gradually growing weaker and weaker.

One day he faints dead away. When the servants undress him to put him to bed, they find out his true condition. He is a leper, a doomed leper. Then they drive him out from the home. They drive him out from the habitations of man. They drive him out to live and die among the lepers. Now you can see how grateful that leper ought to have been when Jesus brushed away the fatal scales of leprosy from off his breast and arms and neck and forehead. Do you wonder that that leper returned to thank God for his physical health?

Ought not scores and hundreds of us to thank God for our restored physical health? Some of us will remember the day when we never expected to be strong and well, as we are now. Perhaps your physical history has been that of suffering, weakness from up to twenty or twenty-five years of age and never knew what it was to have an ache or a pain. Then disease, like a creeping paralysis, got hold of us. Then our health came back to us almost as miraculously as did the restored health of the ancient leper. We felt as one snatched from the tomb. Like the leper of old, are you grateful to God for that restored physical health? Remember that one day a day when you would gladly have given every dollar you owned to be physically well as you are to-day. Now, are you glorifying God, like the leper of my text? Are you glorifying Christ? Oh, the inestimable blessings of a sound physical body! Who would dare to keep silent lips when God has thus blessed him with a sound physical body?

But next to the blessing of physical health, for which do you suppose that leper of old thanked Jesus? Do you suppose that cleansed leper kept kneeling at Christ's feet, saying, "Master, Master, I can never thank thee enough! I will never leave thee! I will always stay by thy side if thou will only let me?" No, I do not believe that leper did any such thing. I do not believe he stayed with Christ very long. I think he ran to Christ to give him his thanks. I think he said, "Master, I want to run home and see my wife and children and father and mother, and all my dear ones. Oh, I want to tell them what you have done for me. I want to take them in my arms and kiss them, just as I used to do before these fatal scales came upon my breast." Then I think Jesus said, "Go, my son, go! Go and tell your dear ones the glad news. I have given them to you to love just as I have given you your physical health." Now I see that cleansed leper running toward his old home. I hear him say as he goes, "Jesus has given me back my father and mother and brothers and sisters and my wife and little children. Thank God for my restored home! Thank God!" As you thank God for your physical health, are you also thanking Him for the restoration of the purity and the love of your domestic circle?

Do you thank him for your babies' cries? Do you thank him for your wife's tender, gentle companionship? Do you thank God because your old mother is yet alive and that you can ever thinking and planning and praying for her? Is no number of babies? Do you thank God because your dear ones' joys are your joys and because your sorrows of life are opened by their willingness to help you share them? Have you ever thanked God for the infinite joy he has given to you of living and working with the treasured members of the home circle? Ah, yes, we appreciate our dear ones when God takes one of them away from us. Why do we not and why can we not appreciate our loved ones when they are by our side? If any of them should have gone beyond we should think of death simply as a transition, a going from one group of loved ones to another group of loved ones. Can you not thank God for the wife, the mother, the father, the sister, the brother, the child of the family circle? Can you not, like the leper of old, thank God for the purity and the love of the domestic fireside?

But no sooner did this cleansed leper reach his home and clasp his dear wife and children and loved ones in his arms than at once the news began to spread. A few like a white winged messenger of joy from housetop to housetop. "Have you heard the news?" asked one neighbor of another. "Why, our long lost friend has been cleansed of his leprosy. Come let us go up and give our hand of love and join this happy family circle. Oh, the good news, the good news! Come, let us go up and tell how we have mourned for him and how we glory in his wonderful cure." Then I think the neighbors spoke to each other. Now I see them hastening to the home. Some knock and others rush right in. These neighbors request his hand; they pat his cheek; they shout in his ear, "Glad to see you, O man whose name is Leper, but now Cleansed!" Then they put his cheek; they laugh and weep for joy. Then they say, "Thank God for your many friends who are living under the shadow of your home to-day!"

When we were sick did not our friends come in to nurse us and to bring the delicacies? When we lost a child and the undertaker hung the black crape upon our door, did not our loving, sympathizing friends come in to stand by our side at the casket? When we were in financial trouble, if we were honest and true, have they not always been willing to come to our assistance? Have they not always been true to us in times of sorrow as well as in times of joy? I once read of an old Danish captain who gave battle to an English frigate. After the battle had been raging for some time a flag of truce was raised, and the old captain in a rowboat pulled over to the English frigate and made this strange request. He said: "My powder has run out. Will you please furnish me some of your powder, and we will continue to fight!" Well, no one ever heard of such a request. Powder is life, but we have heard of his going to his friends. Ah, yes, our friends in the past have helped us again and again and again! Thank God for your friends! Thank God for our true-hearted, brave, self-sacrificing friends!

Again, this cleansed leper must have been thankful that the doors of the temple were once more opened to give him a welcome to the altar of God. In olden times, leprosy was looked upon as the symbol of heinous sin. Hence the poor leper not only felt that he was barred from fellowship with man, but also from communion with God. Methinks I can see these lepers some Sabbath day gathering outside of the hillsides near to Jerusalem. The service is going on within the sacred walls. The music, which caused the circumscribed by four walls, drifts through the portal and, like a bird, soars over the hills. The poor lepers are listening to the sweet psalms. As the choir sings, they pray. At a time when they used to gather in the temple with the worshipers, they can think I see tears rain down their parched cheeks as they weep and cry: "O Lord, why hast thou shut us out from thy love? Why am I barred from thy holy worship? Why can I never again gather me in tones of pity and pardon? Will thou never forgive me my past sins?" Then when Jesus cured the poor sick man of his leprosy, he seemed to say: "Son, thy sins are forgiven thee." Then he welcome now to join in public worship. Then prayest now go into the temple and sing God's praises. Though thy sins are as scarlet, yet they shall be some white as snow." Then I see the poor leper cry: "Lord, I thank thee that when thou hast cleansed me of my leprosy, thou hast forgiven me my sins. I thank thee, Lord. I thank thee!" To-day can you not glorify God like the poor leper, because Christ by his atoning blood has made it possible for you to be cleansed of all your past iniquities, so that in the sight of God you are as pure through his word?

Oh, the power of the blood of Jesus to blot out sin! Who has tongue eloquent enough to fully describe it? There is a beautiful song told that many years ago a woman came to her pastor bearing her child. She came in heavy burden," she said. "They are like a load of wet sand." The minister very gently and agreed. "Have you ever been on that strip of sand by the beacon?" he asked. "Oh, many many times," she said. "Go there now," said he, "and dig. Pile the wet sand up into a great mound. Do it as high as you can and then see what becomes of it." "Ah," she answered the perplexed woman, "I know what you mean. The flowing tide will come and wash it all away." "Yes," said the minister, "so the blood of Jesus Christ can wash away all your sins, though they may be as infinite in number as the sands of the sea!"

They by day as he went around in health and strength he would remember who it was that gave him his new life and would strive to live in accordance with Christ's teaching. Is not that our duty? Shall we praise him for delivering us from sin and then go away and forget our obligations? The life that Christ has given us, like that he gave the leper, should be a life devoted to him, consecrated to him and to his service. He has told us how we may show our gratitude. He died "that they who live should henceforth live not unto themselves, but unto him who died for them."

Danger In Blotters.
A fresh danger has been probed by The Lancet, if indeed may be said to probe. It is the botting pad. As an eminent physician says, "The whole matter would be rapidly dried on it." We breathe upon our blotting pads, those of us who still write with pen, so we scatter such diseases as are ours. "A fresh spotless sheet every day" is The Lancet's prescription. One foresees a boom in blotting paper. Then all our decaying industries one at least will be stationary.

BRONCHIAL TROUBLES.
READILY YIELD TO SOOTHING HEALING TREATMENT OF HYOMEI.

Bronchial troubles are purely local They cannot be helped by stomach dosing. They are caused by irritation in the air passages and can be relieved and cured by medicated air alone. In this lies the secret of the great success of Hy-o-mei in the treatment of bronchial troubles.

The Hy-o-mei medication, laden with nature's remedies, is breathed through the neat pocket inhaler that comes with every outfit, reaching every part of the bronchial tubes and killing at once the disease germs. It allays all irritation and heals the inflammation of the mucous membrane with astonishing rapidity.

Treatment with spray, douches and atomizers in bronchial troubles is condemned by the best physicians, because they cause irritation.

The first breath of Hy-o-mei's medicated air seems to soothe the inflammation, stop the cough, and thus relief soon becomes permanent and a cure results.

We do not want anyone's money unless Hyomei gives relief and cure, and we absolutely agree that money will be refunded unless the remedy gives satisfaction.

All druggists should be able to supply you with Hyomei or we will send it by mail on receipt of price, $1.00, and every package is sold with the distinct understanding that it costs nothing unless it cures. Booth's Hyomei Company, Buffalo, N.Y.

HER PET AVERSION.
The Reason One Woman Is Afraid of Her Bathtub.

"I know a good many people are afraid of a bathtub," said a woman, "but not in the same way I am. I am not afraid of the water after I am in the tub. It's getting in and out I am afraid of, though water in a bathtub has been known to drown a man, and of a man once who was drowned in his bathtub. Many a man has drowned in his bathtub, but I suppose I am afraid of the one, and that was what brought it home to me. Whenever they introduced her they whispered, 'Her husband was drowned in a bathtub.'

"It seemed to me a sort of disgrace to her, that way of dying. If he went out to drown, why didn't he go in the river? If he didn't do it purposely, then it was the fault of the bathtub, and that makes it a dangerous thing, to my notion.

"I knew another man who was seriously injured by a bathtub. He was a great friend of mine. He had promised to help me in a lot of ways, with my work and one thing and another. Then he was taken very ill. He was upon the verge of recovery and had written me he was coming to call in a day or two, when I got word that he had fallen in the bathtub or on it—I have forgotten which—maybe it fell on him—and had broken three ribs.

"I never get in or out of my bathtub without thinking of those three ribs or without being afraid I'll fall on the edge of it and knock out all my front teeth."

His Golden Opportunity.
A Baltimore man tells of an address made to some school children in that city by a well known divine of many degrees. "My young friends," said the speaker, "let me urge upon you the importance of only moderate good books, but of owning them, so that you may have access to them at all times. When I was your age I could not frequently to work all night to earn money to buy books, and then get before daylight to read them."—Success Magazine.

His Mistake.
"I thought it was a good time to ask the old gentleman for his daughter. He is suffering from a recently broken arm."
"Well?"
"I found I made a mistake in not waiting until he broke a leg."

DON'T PUT IT OFF LONGER

GET RID OF THAT INDIGESTION AT ONCE BY USING MI-O-NA.

Either through slackness or care lessness hundreds of people slowly poison themselves by chronic indigestion. By neglecting to cure at once any sluggishness of the important organs of digestion the system is filled with fermenting and decaying food that results in sick headaches, foul breath and taste in the mouth, coated tongue, specks before the eyes, sleeplessness, nervous troubles and the many other symptoms that are the direct result of indigestion.

The want of a perfectly safe, yet effective cure for indigestion and stomach troubles in their many forms was felt up to the time of the successful investigations that resulted in the production of Mi-o-na stomach tablets. They quickly cure the worst cases of indigestion, and the pain and distress which are often felt after meals disappear in a very few days—which is the wonderful curative power of Mi-o-na.

The old-fashioned medicines for stomach troubles merely digest the food, while Mi-o-na strengthens the digestive organs—so that they soon become able to care for the food that is eaten.

We absolutely agree that your money will be refunded should you buy a 50c. box of Mi-o-na stomach tablets and not be satisfied with the results. Mi-o-na is sold by druggists everywhere, or will be sent by mail on receipt of price, 50 cents. Booth's Mi-o-na Company, Buffalo, N. Y.

A REMARKABLE INVENTION FOR THE Culture of Hair

THE EVANS VACUUM CAP is a practical invention constructed on scientific and hygienic principles by the simple means of which a free and normal circulation is restored throughout the scalp. The minute blood vessels are gently stimulated to be carried to the hair roots, the supply which can only be derived from the blood, vigorous growth of hair. There is no rubbing, and as no drugs or chemicals of whatsoever kind are employed there is nothing to cause irritation. It is only necessary to wear the Cap three or four minutes daily.

60 DAYS' FREE TRIAL.
The Company's Guarantee.

AS EVANS VACUUM CAP will be sent you for sixty days' free trial.—If you are not satisfied that it is doing all we claim for it, that it will positively prevent baldness, and completely restore your hair, you are at liberty to return the Cap with the whole purchase money, and we undertake to refund it without question. This guarantee is deposited with the Chancery Lane Safe Deposit Company of London, the largest and most influential institution of its kind in the world, and is a sufficient guarantee that the money will be returned in full, on demand without question, at any time during the trial period.

The eminent Dr. I. N. LOVE, in his address to the Medical Board on the subject of Alopecia (loss of hair), stated that if a means could be devised to bring nutrition to the hair follicles (hair roots) without resorting to any irritating process, the problem of hair growth could be solved. Later on, when the EVANS VACUUM CAP was submitted to him for inspection, he stated that the Cap would do what Dr. Love had previously made before the Medical Board.

Dr. W. MOORE, referring to the invention, says that the principle upon which the Evans Vacuum Cap is founded is absolutely correct and indisputable.

An illustrated and descriptive book of the Evans Vacuum Cap will be sent, post free, on application.

A Magistrate Investigates Zam-Buk

SAYS IS A WONDERFUL HEALER AND DOES MORE THAN IS CLAIMED FOR IT.

Probably no household remedy in Canada has won such glowing tributes from people in high places as has Zam-Buk. Sir Roger T. Percy, Justice of the Peace for British Columbia, recently tested this famous balm, and this is what he says of it:

"The Pavilion,
"Goldfields, B. C.

"To the Zam-Buk Co.

"Gentlemen,—After a very fair trial I have proved Zam-Buk eminently satisfactory. In my case it cured a skin rash of five years standing which no doctor had been able to do any good for.

"I would certainly encourage any person to keep Zam-Buk in their home. IT TRULY DOES MORE THAN YOU CLAIM FOR IT. For my own part I would not now be without it in the house. Yours very truly, (Signed) "Roger T. Percy, Justice of the Peace for B.C."

Zam-Buk differs from ordinary salves and embrocations, for while these mostly contain animal oils and fat Zam-Buk is purely herbal. It relieves at once pain, festering sores, ulcers, eruptions, boils, eczema, chafing sores, etc. In the household it is the handiest possible remedy for burns, scalds, children's injuries. It instantly cleanses any wound to which it is applied. It prevents festering, inflammation or blood poisoning. It cures piles, varicose ulcers, and fistula. All druggists and stores sell at 50 cents a box, or from the Zam-Buk Co., Toronto, for price, 6 boxes for $2.50.

A BEGGAR OF KHIVA.

He Was Noisy and a Thing of Shreds and Patches.

In an open square, where the dust pall forbade sight or breath, I directed my steps toward the source of a throbbing roll that ceaselessly wove itself in with the noise of voices and the pattering of unshod feet of beasts. As I neared it the noise became detached from the hubbub, a distinct and individual thing, which insistently claimed attention and made the very motes in the air dance to time. Under a willow tree by the water ditch that defined the square sat a bent old man, unbelievably ragged. So torn were his many khalats that they did not seem like constructed garments at all, but strings of tatters and tags collected and hung on his fat, weak body. His head was bent on his breast, and his eyes were half closed. On his stomach was a wooden bowl, with a skin drum head stretched across it, and on this drum head he beat incessantly with his knuckles, and his feet. The motion was so automatic and deadly regular in its recurrent changes that it seemed almost as if he were a clockwork figure set in the midst of the busy market to record the passage of time. I flung some coppers on the brass begging tray by his side and went off, unconsciously adjusting my steps to his beating. He made the trivial barter and the dirging of Indian animals seem vapid and futile, and my bit of charity sickened me. It was as if I had happened along and patted Socrates on the back.—Langdon Warner in Century.

Promptitude Efficiency

THE DAY-LIGHT STORE

NOWADAYS ITS "MADILL'S."

GREATER NAPANEE'S BIG STORE

We talk shop—"When you ask me what business really means," said Andrew Carnegie, in a recent interview, "I would begin by saying that the root of business must be service to the community." The aim of this store is service to the community, good service—the best. The first principle of service is to sell only merchandise that is dependable. The second principle is truthfulness in advertising that merchandise and in selling it. From these two principles there can be no departure, not in the slightest degree, at this store.

Misrepresentation of values in order to sell goods has no place in our plan of publicity. It is not needed as a cloak to cover poor merchandise, high prices and inefficient service, for we are troubled with none of these things. What we advertise you will find in our store exactly as advertised. Back of every transaction is the "Madill" absolute guarantee of perfect satisfaction.

NEWBURGH.

The last Literary of the year was held in the N.H.S. on Thursday afternoon. Being Empire Day the programme was strictly in keeping with the occasion. T. A. Dunwoody, Chairman of the Board of Education, occupied the chair. The programme consisted of, chorus, "Canada to England"; Glee Club; Chairman's address; essay on Newfoundland, Miss Nellie Lockridge; solo, Miss Lizzie Winters; essay on Australia, Gladwin Clark; essay on New Zealand, Miss Marion Lapum; instrumental duet, Misses Wood and Patterson; recitation, "The Daddy of Them All", Edgar Salsbury; essay on Cape Colony, Miss Lillian Foster; solo, Miss Aleta Scriver; essay on Canada and Orange River Colony, Miss Grace Patterson; instrumental duet, Misses Beaman and Finkle; recitation, "The Recession", Miss Jennie Brandon; address, H. A. Nesbitt, I.P.S.; chorus, "Fair Canada," Glee Club. God Save the King.

Victoria day was spent very quietly by our citizens. A few took in the celebration at Kingston. A large number went up to Camden East, where the local senior team played an interesting game of baseball against the Camden East team. Neither team was in shape, but nevertheless the game was very exciting, Newburgh team winning by a score of 17-16. Skinner, of Yarker, pitched for Camden East, while W. B. Dunn and George Shorey served up the benders for the locals. G. H. Thomson umpired the game.

A junior baseball team from the village defeated a Yarker team in Yarker the same afternoon, by a score of 11-8.

A travelling Stock Co. held the boards at Finkle's Opera House at night, and had a fair crowd.

The senior baseball team clash with the High School team at Diamond park on Friday, at 4 p. m. The students are reported to have a fast team and the seniors will have to go some to beat them.

Miss Grace Bougan spent Wednesday in Tweed.

Dr. Beeman returned from Perth on Tuesday, having been called there on Saturday by the illness of his brother, Dr. Beeman.

Miss Clark is visiting at J. M. Denyes'.

Miss Brisco spent last week with friends in Napanee.

Miss Aleta Scriver spent Friday and Saturday with friends in Enterprise and Tamworth.

Mr. Madden spent Victoria day with Miss Knapp, Kingston.

We understand the cheap fares hitherto existing on the B. and Q. Ry to Napanee and Kingston on Thursdays and Saturdays, and to other points on Wednesday, will be cancelled this week, taking effect June 1st. The new three cents a mile rate will not make material difference to the travellers from the village, but the cancelling of the cheap fare will. Heretofore the passenger traffic from Newburgh to Napanee on Thursday and Saturday has been very large, but the chances are the full fare rate will diminish the number.

Fred. Shorts spent last week in Toronto and Galt.

Fred. Mears left for Montreal on Monday.

Wm. Bradshaw, Brockville, spent Sunday with his family here.

Harry Ballard spent Victoria day at his home in Madoc.

Miss Littlejohn, Brockville, spent last week with her sister, Mrs. G. A. Aylesworth.

Miss Effie Welbanks, Shannonville, spent Sunday with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Welbanks.

Court of Revision was held on Monday evening.

Rev. J. H. Chant and Robert Doncan are on the sick list.

Sidney Rose, Tamworth, and Miss Wagar, Enterprise, spent Thursday with Miss Ella Chant.

J. M. Denyes spent Saturday in Odessa.

Miss Beaman spent Friday with Miss Gertrude, Yarker.

James Grogan, who was taken to Hotel Dieu, Kingston, some weeks ago, died in that hospital on Friday. The remains were brought here on Saturday and interred in the R. C. cemetery, Centreville. The late Mr. Grogan has been a prominent figure on the streets of our village for years, and made many friends. Last July he fell out of a mow, breaking several bones, and from the effects of which he never recovered.

J. W. Courtney was in Mount Pleasant last week attending the fiftieth anniversary of the I.O.G.T.

Crop prospects throughout the west are improving rapidly under decidedly favorable weather conditions. What is growing fast, and in some localities, especially through southern Manitoba and Saskatchewan, is up three or four inches. Frost on Sunday night stopped it slightly, but will not seriously affect the crop. Every day, however, is valuable, and anything tending to retard growth is but adding to the anxiety for favorable weather.

A DOUBLE WEDDING

Quite an excitement was caused in the village of Tamworth, bright and early on Wednesday morning, when another marriage was solemnized in the Christ Church, by Rev. J. W. Jones, this time between Dr. T. Sanderson and Miss Mary Gibbs. The bride's brother, Jay Gibbs acted as groomsman, and Miss Cora Tripp was bridesmaid. Immediately after the ceremony the wedding party drove away to the Methodist church, where the groomsman and bridesmaid became husband and wife. A sumptuous breakfast was served at the happy couples at the home of Geo. Gibbs, father of the bride, and groom, respectively, after which the double wedding party caught the train for Kingston and points west, followed by the good wishes of every one. From their return they will take up residence in Tamworth.

FISHING AND SHOOTING.

The Canadian Pacific Railway advertising department has issued an attractive booklet to furnish accurate information to sportsmen, regarding the haunts of fish and game obtainable in Canada and in the territory reached by the Canadian Pacific Railway.

The great forests of the Dominion of Canada have long been recognized as the home of big game. The prairies are the favorite hunting places of the wild fowl, partridge, chicken and moose, etc. The marshes are the haunts of the wild water fowl and the great waterways the home of the many species of fish.

The Canadian facilities for this class of fur, feather and game are excellent. The sportsman is not required to go in search of the desired game. Consultation with the nearest local agent will supply information as to the exact locality where the many excellent fishing and shooting districts are located. Particular attention is paid to the wants and requirements of sportsmen, and for a couple of cents information regarding any district will be promptly given upon application to J. Quinlan, Passenger Agent, Canadian Pacific Railway, Montreal, Que., or to any ticket agent or station agent mentioning The Napanee Beaver.

THE COUNTRY MERCHANT.

"Yes," remarked a country merchant, sorrowfully, to a friend, "I'm a victim of circumstances. I'm up against it. I'm a victim of the many inducements offered by the mail order houses. send them every month and draw us out at sight, but if I send a bill to a farmer for he pays it, sometimes, and sometimes he doesn't. Why, I can't even get a loan at my bank. While I can't go for money, many of those who are owing me are sending cash in answer to mail order letters. If I could collect one-tenth of the money I owe I'd be a rich man. I'm going to quit. I don't like to do it, but I don't pay. I am a fool. Every day I am asked to dig up for something that means nothing, from a raffle ticket to a church fund, by people who claim I ought to do this because they do part of their trading here, but sign circulars. Robert Simpson and T. Eaton, neither buy milk cans nor help the church fund, and yet get the cash in advance business. I'm going to write up a catalogue and loan paper among the wholesale houses where we trade. I would get the laugh proper. If I sell a pair of pants I must treat the family to candy and cigars. They buy a load of potatoes I must do the same. Customers, who are able to pay have to go to their money while I pay 8 per cent. at the bank to get ready cash. I have a fair business during hard times and poor crops from people who are willing to trade with me, providing I can duplicate catalogue house prices and wait until harvest for money. My scales weigh too much, when I sell sugar, and too little, when I buy butter. I am a thief and a grafter. If I write I am a soft soaps hypocrite, and if I do not I am a scrimp. Yes, certainly this is a snap. And he looked over $10,000 worth of accounts, all good, and wonders how he could raise $350 to pay a sight draft due to-morrow. Ex.

LOOK WELL TO THE HORSE.

(Canadian Dairyman.)

Horses till an important place on every dairy farm. They are indispensable, and consequently should not be regarded merely as a "side-issue," and cared for accordingly. The feeding and general care of horses, like that of cows, is a skilled art. In the pig the increase in weight is the chief consideration in the feeding operations. In fattening cattle the same object is sought after. In dairy cattle the production of milk is the principal factor, although other qualities are important. In the horse many factors enter into the problem of feeding. Not only must the weight be sustained, but nerve, action, capacity for work and general condition are qualities that count for even more than mere avoirdupois.

The good feeder is a born horseman. He takes to the work naturally. Put such a man in charge of a team against another in a similar capacity. Let each be under similar conditions as regards class of horses, work to be done and the men to draw from. The former will come out of the stable with a team showing style and action that bespeak its capacity for doing a good day's work. The other team will emerge from the stable with a lingering step, dull eye and rough coat that advertise only too well the lack of judgment in the feeding and management.

A horse, in order to be always ready to do what is expected of him, should receive proper care. Let the morning and noon feeds be light, that is, not bulky. At night he is ready for a full meal, and has lots of time to digest it. A variety of feeds is appreciated, and gives best results. Experiments have shown that a work horse should be supplied with two pounds of food for each one hundred pounds weight, and of this ten to eighteen pounds, in proportion to severity of work performed, should be grain.

It doesn't pay to neglect the horse If you want him to make good, he comes a close second to the dairy cow in regard to the amount of attention he should get.

THE WOMAN AT HOME.

Never scrape an iron enamel pot or pan, as that is what ruins it.

Zinc is best cleaned with hot, soapy water, then polish with kerosene and coal ash.

When polishing stoves a fine gloss is obtained by adding a teaspoonful of alum to the ordinary black lead.

When making a steamed or boiled pudding put a plait in the cloth at the top to allow for the pudding to swell.

Turpentine and beeswax melted together make a cream which makes a fine polish for leather upholstered furniture.

Whipped cream added at the last moment to cooked custard makes the latter a great addition to the cream soup, wherever its kind.

To clean a soap freeze pan fill with cold water and leave on the stove to boil. When boiling drop a red hot coal in it, then wash in the usual way.

In buying a hair mattress choose one piled with black rather than white hair, as the latter has generally been bleached, which deprives it of its resiliency and makes it wear more quickly than the black or gray hair.

The shoe that leaves a ridge skirt or basket to rub or bruise, does wear easily. The shoe that is best for comfort with ease, is that which is used in laundry shakes. While still damp press the goods under a thin cloth.

To prevent cake from sticking to tins when baked but grease tins, then flour them, gently beating out all loose flour, leaving only what clings to the grease, thus doing away with the old form of lining with paper.

In laundering white spreads or any large piece where difficulty is experienced in finding the large soiled spots a good plan is to fasten a piece of black silk thread to most soiled places. The spots can then be easily detected.

For a vegetable salad that is particularly palatable for warm weather take large, ripe tomatoes, cut in fancy shaped tomatoes and fill the cavity with diced cucumbers and green peppers, mixed with mayonnaise and dressed with mayonnaise.

The tops of silk stockings make excellent dust cloths, as they, neither scratch nor shed lint. Sewed over a square of leather cut from a shoe top they make desirable holders, pliable to the hand, but because of the leather, slow to heat through.

When the scalp is affected with dandruff in any form it is absolutely necessary to be scrupulously careful with fluffs to the cleanliness of the hair brushes. Hair brushes, when the scalp is quite healthy, should always be washed once a week, and twice a week is not too often.

Soak all evaporated fruits over night, but only in water to cover; too much makes them watery. All such fruits to be cooked after being first placed in cold water to cover for a couple of hours; then well scrubbed with one of the small brushes that come for the purpose and rest two hours before placing them in the water in which they are to remain all night.

WONDERFUL.

Two thousand men, women and children have visited the Red Star Ice Cream Parlor during the month of May. They all pronounce ice cream and ices cream soda first class in every respect. Often hear the remark, "Isn't it swell? Ice cream and ice cream soda as good as we get in the city. Just what is wanted in Napanee, a first class ice cream parlor." Fifty gallons ice cream sold in ten days, come and give us a trial, will have no fear. You will be a steady customer. Remember the place, opposite the Royal Hotel—Red Star. 2-tf

THE MASQUERADER

By Katherine Cecil Thurston, author of The Circle, etc.

"Astrupp had caught a fever in Florence, and I was rushing away for fear of the infection, when our stupid little train ran off the rails near Pistoria and smashed itself up. Fortunately we were within half a mile of a village, so we weren't quite bereft. The village was impossibly like a toy village, and the accommodation what one would expect in a Noah's ark, but it was all absolutely picturesque. I put up at the little inn with my maid and Ko Ko—Ko Ko was such a sweet dog—a white poodle. I was tremendously keen on poodles that year." She stopped and looked thoughtfully toward the fire.

"But, to come to the point of the story. Jack, the toy village had a toy doll!" She laughed again. "He was an Englishman—and the first person to come to my rescue on that night of the smashup. He was staying at the Noah's ark inn, and after that first night I saw him—Oh, Jack, he can't put any imagination!" Her voice sounded petulant and sharp. The man who is indifferent to the recital of an old love affair implies the worst kind of distrust "I believe you aren't interested," she added in another and more reproachful tone.

He leaned forward. "You're wrong there," he said slowly. "I'm deeply interested."

She glanced at him again. His tone reassured her, but his words left her puzzled. Chilcote was rarely emphatic. With a touch of hesitation she went on with her tale:

"As I told you, he was the first to find us—to find me, I should say, for my stupid maid was having hysterics over Ko Ko's fate, and Ko Ko was lost. I remember the first thing I did was to send him in search of Ko Ko"—she interchanged his position. Loder found occasion to smile. "Did he succeed?" he said dryly.

"Succeed? Oh, yes, he succeeded." She also smiled involuntarily. "Poor Ko Ko was stowed away under the big dresser, and after quite a lot of trouble he pulled him out. When it was all done the doc was quite mildurt and trembly from ever, but the Englishman must explain," he said very quietly.

Lillian smiled. "That's just what I want to do. When I was in my bed on the night of Blanche's party, a man came to be gazed for. He came just once, and very softly and laid his hands upon the table. He had strong, thin hands like—well, rather like yours. But he never put a ring on the third finger of his left hand—a heavy signet ring and a plain gold one.

Loder listened and imperceptibly till the cushion covered it. Lillian's words caused him no surprise, scarcely even any interest. He felt now that he had expected them, even waited for them, all along.

"I asked him to take off his rings," she went on, "and just for a second he hesitated—I could feel him hesitate. Then he seemed to have made up his mind, for he drew them off. He drew them off, Jack, and guess what I saw! No guess!"

For the first time Loder involuntarily drew back into his corner of the couch. "I never guess," he said brusquely.

"Then I'll tell you. His hands were the hands of my Englishman! The rings covered the scar made by Ko Ko's teeth. I knew it instantly—the second my eyes rested on it. It was the same scar that I had bound up dozens of times, that I had seen healed before I left Santasalvre."

"And you? What did you do?" Loder felt it singularly difficult and unpleasant to speak.

"Ah, that's the point. That's where I was stupid and made my mistake. I should have spoken to him on the moment, but I didn't. You know how sometimes hesitates. Afterward it was too late."

"But you saw him afterward—in the course?" Loder spoke unwillingly.

"No, I didn't—that's the other point. I didn't see him in the rooms, and I haven't seen him since. Directly he was gone I left the tent—I pretended to be hungry and bored—but, though I went through every room, he was nowhere to be found. Once"—she hesitated and laughed again—"once I thought I had found him, but it was only you—you, as you stood in that doorway with your mouth and chin hidden by Leonard Kstine's head. Wasn't it a quaint mistake?"

There was an uncertain pause. Then for the first time Loder knew what his presence in the room really meant, and at best the knowledge was disconcerting. It is not every day that a man is called upon to unearth himself.

"Suggest?" he repeated blankly.

"Yes. I'd rather have your idea of the affair than anybody else's. You are so dear and sarcastic and keen that you can't help getting straight at the middle of a fact."

When Lillian wanted anything she could be very sweet. She unhappily dropped her half petulant tone; she suddenly ceased to be a spoiled child. With a perfectly graceful movement she drew quite close to Loder and slid gently to her knees.

This is an attitude that few women can safely assume. It requires all the attributes of youth, suppleness and a certain luxury of ease. But Lillian never acted without justification and as she leaned toward Loder, her face lifted, her slight figure and pale hair softened by the firelight, she made a picture that it would have been difficult to criticise.

But the person who should have appreciated it stared steadily beyond it to the fire. His mind was absorbed by one question—the question of how he might reasonably leave the house before discovery became assured.

Lillian, attentively watchful of him, saw the uneasy look, and her own face fell. But, as she looked, an inspiration came to her—a remembrance of many interviews with Chilcote smoothed and facilitated by the timely use of tobacco.

"Jack," she said softly, "before you say another word I insist on your lighting a cigarette." She leaned forward, resting against his knee.

At her words Loder's eyes left the fire. His attention was suddenly needed for a new and more imminent necessity. "Thanks" he said quickly. "I have no wish to smoke."

"It isn't a matter of what you wish, but of what I say." She smiled. She knew that Chilcote with a cigarette between his lips was infinitely more tractable than Chilcote sitting idle, and she had no intention of ignoring the knowledge.

But Loder caught at her words. "Before you ordered me to smoke," he said, "you told me to give you some advice. Your first command must have prior claim." He resigned unhesitatingly at the less risky theme.

She looked up at him. "You're always wiser when you smoke," she persisted caressingly. "Light a cigarette—and give me one."

Loder obediently became set. "No," he said, "we'll stick to this advice business. It interests me."

"Yes—afterward."

"No; now. You want to find out why this Englishman from Italy was at your sister's party and why he disappeared?"

There are times when a malignant obstinacy seems to affect certain people. The only answer Lillian made was to pass her hand over Loder's wrist. She must, feeling his cigarette case, to draw it from the pocket.

He affected not to see it. "Do you think he recognized you in that tent?" he insisted desperately.

She held out the case. "Here are your cigarettes. You know we're always more social when we smoke."

In the short interval while she looked up into his face every mental idea passed through Loder's mind. He thought of standing up suddenly and regaining his advantage. He wondered quickly whether one hand could possibly suffice" for the taking out and lighting of the cigarettes. Then all need for speculation was pushed suddenly aside.

Lillian, looking into his face, saw his fresh look of disturbance, and from long experience again changed her tactics. Laying the cigarette case on the had his finger almost bitten through. Ko Ko was a dear, but his teeth and his temper were both very sharp." She laughed once more in soft amusement.

Loder was silent for a second, then he too laughed—Chilcote's short, sarcastic laugh. "And you tied up the wound, I suppose?"

She glanced up, half displeased. "We aren't both staying at the little inn," she said, as though no further explanation could be needed. Then again her manner changed. She moved nearer, cuddling herself and toileted his right hand. His left, which was farthest away from her, was well in the shadow of the cushions.

"Jack," she said caressingly, "it isn't so tell you this stupid old story that I've brought you here—only to tell you a sort of sequel." She stroked his hand gently once or twice. "As I say, I lost this man and he would become very fond of each other. You understand? Then we quarreled—quarreled quite badly—and I came away. I've remembered him rather longer than I remember most people—he was one of those dogged individuals who stick in one's mind. But he has stayed in mine for another reason." Again she stirred up. "He has stayed because you helped to keep him there. You know how I have sometimes put my hands over your mouth and told you that your eyes reminded me of some one else? Well, that some one else was my Englishman. But you mustn't be jealous. He was a horrid, obstinate person, and you—well, you know what I think of you"—She pressed his hand. "But to come to the end of the story. I never saw this man since that long time ago—not until the night of Blanche's party." She spoke slowly, to give full effect to her words. Then she waited for his surprise.

But the result was not what she expected. He said nothing, and, with an absurd inconsequence, drew his hand from between hers.

"Aren't you surprised?" she asked at last, with a distinct note of reproof.

He started slightly, as if recalled to the necessity of the moment. "Surprised?" he said. "Why should I be surprised? One person more or less at a big party isn't astonishing. Besides, you expect a man to turn up sooner or later in his own country. Why should I be surprised?"

She lay back luxuriously. "Because, my dear boy," she said softly, "it is a mystery! It's one of those fascinating mysteries that come once in a lifetime."

Loder made no movement. "You

Kicks Its Food Into Its Mouth.

"This is an aye-aye," said the keeper of the monkey house. "Watch it kick food into its mouth."

The aye-aye, a handsome lemur, hurried to the plate of cut carrots that the keeper had just pushed under the bars. It stood before the food, which it took up piece by piece in its fore paw and kicked swiftly through the air into its open mouth. Like a juggler, it kept a yellow chain of carrots curving through the air from the foot to its mouth continuously. The quick toss of the leg with which this was done had, undoubtably, the look of a kick.

"Aye-aye come from Madagascar," the keeper said. "They are nocturnal in their habits, and they live in trees. The natives regard them with superstitious reverence. They are the only creatures extant that kick their food into their mouths."

The Sin of Insurance.

"When life insurance was first instituted," said an antiquary, "the church and pious people generally were dead set against it. They said that it was gambling in human lives. They said, too, that it would encourage murder. They were right in a way. Life insurance is gambling in human lives—but only the odds are so great in the companies' favor that they can never lose. It is also an encouragement to murder. A good many murders are committed every year for the sake of life insurance policies. But these evils are no more than fly specks on the great beneficent life insurance bodies. Life insurance does so much good that the evils attendant on it are by comparison nil."

Acoustics and Coughing.

Coughing is one of the nuisances that no one has been able to abolish in churches or in theaters. A physician, however, claims that the coughing nuisance is a mere question of acoustics.

"There is a subtle connection between the ear and the throat," he said. "When the ear is strained the throat is affected, and a cough is the result. When we can hear perfectly in church or theater it never occurs to us to cough. But when we lean forward, straining every nerve to catch the actor's or preacher's muffled syllables, we find our throats coughing every little while. Build auditoriums with perfect acoustic properties and I warrant that the thunderous clearings of coughs so common now among us will be no more heard."

Life in the Kennel.

The following story from a well known Devonshire clergyman shows how the life in the kennel is brightened by play: "Some fifty years ago I was staying at Sir Gartth's during which the first whip showed me a tunnel in the sitting ground about six feet long which the hounds had dug themselves and utilized as follows: They used to choose one of themselves and start him to run round the yard, they being in full pursuit, till he had enough. Then he went to ground in the tunnel, while another hound took his turn to be hunted and go to ground." This is one way in which hounds train themselves.—T. F. Dale in Outing Magazine.

No Comparison.

Mrs. Upstarte was recalling her early married life.

"Ah, yes," she sighed, "we were happy then—foolishly happy to our little Utopia."

"You seem to be once once or twice," said Mrs. Gaswell, "and I don't blame you for moving away from it. Newport is ever so much finer, isn't it?"

Into the Next Day.

"When I leave you tonight," said Mr. Staylate, "I hope you'll—"

"Great scott! Is something again to night?" exclaimed Miss Patience Gonne.

Then for the first time the proximity of the dawn dawned on him and he lit out.—Exchange.

Too Fast.

Sore Aching Feet.

SOOTHED BY ZAM-BUK.

Men, women and girls engaged in stores, who have to be on their feet all day, often suffer agonies from chafing sores, soft corns, horny patches, etc. In other cases long standing and walking lead to bad leg, varicose veins and ulcers. Zam-Buk takes the pain out of chafed sores, prevents anything poisonous from stocking dye, and generally heals.

Mrs. K. Watkins, of 26 Forgue Avenue, Montreal, says: "My boy had a sore on his heel which was rubbed by his stocking until it came a very bad wound. Zam-Buk took the soreness out almost instantly, and healed the wound up wonderfully."

Zam-Buk is equally good for cuts, bruises, eczema, scalp sores, itch, barber's rash, blood poison and all skin injuries and diseases. All stores and druggists sell at 50c a box.

BRITISH CASTE.

Love of the Englishman For a Titled Ruling Class.

The presence of a personal sovereign is the outward and visible sign that caste is still supreme in the British empire. The external abuses of the feudal system have been abolished in Great Britain, one by one, until those that still linger are almost harmless, but the inner spirit survives in this late day, and even now its manifestations are abundant in almost every part of the social structure of the British Isles.

There is still alive the fiction that the king rules and that the army of the empire is his majesty's army. There is still a willing acceptance of the titled aristocracy and alas of an upper house, the vast majority of whose members sit there by the right of birth only, without regard to their individual merits.

No doubt the British people could change these things speedily and without violence if they really desired to get rid of this inheritance from feudalism. But they have not got rid of it, and this is evidence enough that they do not wish to do so.

The British see no reason to abolish a state of affairs which the American people look at with amused wonder as a survival of the dark ages. A native American finds it wholly impossible to understand the mental attitude of a certain man of letters in London, who justified his ingrained toryism by the assertion that he simply would not be ruled by his equals.—Reader.

THE WILD CARROT.

One of the Most Interesting of Our Native Plants.

A weed has been defined as "a plant that persists in growing where it is not desired." Surely the wild carrot is a most lovely weed from the point of view of that definition and of the dislike of the farmer. As to the pedestrure, our veteran farmer-naturalist, John Burroughs tells us: "Cut off the head of the wild carrot, and in a week there are five heads in room of the one. Cut off these, and by fall there are ten looking defiance at you from the same root."

The only fault of the wild carrot, as of other so called weeds, is too great success in life. It is guilty only of persistence. But from a nature lover's point of view there are, strictly speaking, no weeds. No plant is distinct. On the contrary, the more a plant is able to strive successfully for life the more of interest it is. We can also see and appreciate the beauty without the "weedy" dislike.

If in this spirit observers will examine the wild carrot the verdict will be that it is one of the prettiest and most interesting of our native plants. The beauty is especially noticeable in the full bloom, or Queen Anne's lace, form. Perhaps some may regard the bird's nest form as the most interesting.—Exchange.

GET RID OF THAT INDIGESTION AT ONCE BY USING MI-O-NA.

Either through slackness or carelessness hundreds of people slowly poison themselves by chronic indigestion. By neglecting to cure at once any sluggishness of the important organs of digestion the system is filled with fermenting and decaying food that results in sick headaches, heartburn, bad taste in the mouth, coated tongue, specks before the eyes, sleeplessness, nervous troubles and the many other symptoms that are the direct result of indigestion.

The want of a perfectly safe, yet effective cure for indigestion and stomach troubles in their many forms was felt up to the time of the successful investigations that resulted in the production of Mi-o-na stomach tablets. They quickly cure the worst cases of indigestion, and the pain and distress which are often felt after meals disappear in a very few days—such is the wonderful curative power of Mi-o-na.

The old-fashioned medicines for stomach troubles merely digest the food, while Mi-o-na strengthens the digestive organs so that they soon become able to care for the food that is eaten.

We absolutely agree that your money will be refunded should you buy a 50c. box of Mi-o-na stomach tablets and not be satisfied with the results. They are sold by druggists everywhere, or will be sent by mail on receipt of price, 50 cents. Booth's Mi-o-na Company, Buffalo, N. Y.

WORKING A SWINDLE.

Clever Scheme Carried Through by a Plausible Woman.

An elegantly dressed Spanish lady one day visited a specialist in mental diseases in Madrid on behalf of her husband, who, she said, was a sufferer from religious mania. Having explained the case, it was arranged that she should return by about an hour with the afflicted husband.

The lady's next scene of action was a jeweler's shop in another part of the city, where she selected diamonds to the value of $5,000 on the understanding that she would buy them if her husband approved. Would some one accompany her home in a cab and the money would be paid immediately? A trusted clerk was sent, and with him the lady drove back to the doctor's house. In an anteroom she took the stones "just to show them to her husband." Then, entering with sublime assurance the doctor's study, she informed the specialist that her husband was now in the anteroom and ready to be examined.

Leaving a visiting card, the lady took her departure, and the doctor, bidding the supposed patient enter, proceeded at his leisure to ask professional questions. The jeweler's man was puzzled at first, but soon he realized that he had been made the victim of a clever fraud. The doctor, however, interpreted his confusion as caused by his complaint, and when after two hours matters were finally explained the lady impostor had vanished with her property without leaving any trace.—London Tit-Bits.

CATARACT OF THE EYE.

How the One It Attacks May Watch the Obstruction Grow.

Cataract is said to be due to the gradual deposition of oxalate of lime in the substance of the crystalline lens, at first in small spots or streaks, sometimes in one part and sometimes in another. The deposit gradually increases until it penetrates the whole of the lens, causing blindness. The remedy, then, is to remove the lens, and after its removal the patient needs assistance to the form of highly magnifying spectacles.

All that is necessary to enable a patient to see is his own cataract for himself or herself. Take a pocket looking glass in the hand and hold the card up to the light close to the eye, looking steadily in the direction of a piece of blue sky. With the card next to the eye the patient will not see the hole pierced by it, or needle, but he will see comparatively large, faintly illuminated field with his cataract projected upon it. He is, in fact, observing the shadow cast by his cataract on the retina at the back of his eyes. With a small puncture in the card the shadow so thrown is relatively sharp. But with a normal eye an evenly illuminated field or clear field will be seen. The patient may thus map down his own cataract and settle for himself whether it is extended or not and whether he will have an operation or not.

The Traveler's Tree Myth.

Among the romantic stories of far off lands that have long maintained their fascination and commanded more or less belief is that of the "traveler's tree," credited with possessing a reservoir of pure water filled to the lives of wanderers in the desert. G. F. Scott Elliot declares from his own experience that the tree grows only in the neighborhood of swamps or springs and that, although it has a considerable amount of water in a hollow at the base of its leaf, the water possesses a disagreeable vegetable taste and of course is inferior to other water to be found in the vicinity.

HERD TESTED.

A. W. Caton & Co. of Riverdale Jersey Farm, had their herd of Jersey cows Tuberculine tested this week. They were found to be free from tuberculosis and in a perfectly healthy condition. This we believe is a step in the right direction, if tuberculosis is to be stamped out. It is certainly very gratifying to the owners of this herd of cattle to know that they are free from disease and certainly should tie to their customers in Town who are using the better made from them. The most eminent physicians claim tuberculosis can be transmitted through the milk and products of the cow to the human family, and we believe that A. W. Caton & Co. are using the proper precautions and will have their herd tested twice a year in future.

THE WORST CLIMATES.

Three Places Where Weather Conditions Are Unbearable.

"Speaking of rank climates," said a globe trotter, "I have experienced the three worst.

"Of these three unspeakable climates I give the palm to the strait of Magellan. There is rain on an average 250 days in the year. The wind blows a hurricane from January to December. The thermometer never rises much above the freezing point—a year round of raw, bitter days of rain and snow.

"Next comes Sierra Leone, on the African west coast. That low lying marshy region has an average temperature of 81 degrees, and the annual rainfall is 189 inches—enormous! There are, too, the 'smokes.' These are rain mists, smelling like oyster and, that rise continually from the marshes, giving marsh fever to nine out of ten of the white men that breathe them—a year round of hot and sticky days, with vile smelling clouds of mist and whirling clouds of mosquitoes.

"Last come the high tablelands of central Asia, where the lack of moisture in the air and the dryness Siberian and the nights arctic—days like a redhot furnace, nights like a January blizzard. Between this range of temperature no human constitution can stand up."

THE ZOO CATERER.

Special Knowledge Required to Run a Wild Animals' Hotel.

"To run a wild animals' hotel—for what is a zoo but that?—requires a lot of special knowledge," said an animal keeper. "How would you, for instance, know how to provide for a rhinoceros or a tapir? If you don't cater right for your animal guests, if you don't give them what they want, they pack up and quit the hotel, you know—that is to say, they die. It amounts to the same thing.

"Yes, it takes special knowledge to feed a zoo. You wouldn't know, would you, that an elephant requires 150 pounds daily—no more, no less—of rice, hay, straw, bread and biscuit?

"A hippo wants more. Give him roots, hay and grass, 200 pounds of them, and he won't register a single kick.

"A giraffe with its dainty appetite, asks only for fifty pounds a day of chaff, cake, grain and clover.

"But don't offer vegetables to lions and tigers. Eight pounds apiece of raw horseflesh, with plenty of bone and gristle, is their ration, year in and year out.

"We have our farms, too, to supply our table, just as lots of other hotels do. Only our farms are queer ones. One is a maize farm. In it with the help of traps, we raise a tremendous annual crop. Another is a worm farm, where we produce yellow mast suitable by the thousand for our birds."—Exchange.

Marie Antoinette's Books.

The unhappy Queen Marie Antoinette possessed an important library of 4,712 volumes, consisting of plays and romances, little books a la mode, the works of Ovid, Horace, Racine, Boileau, Moliere, Corneille, Voltaire and many others. She loved music passionately and had a large collection of operas in eight-nine numbers. The bindings were by Hubert and were uniform in red morocco, with the arms of France and Austria stamped upon them. The execution of the work was poor and the decadence in the art of binding evident. The glories of the art of Padeloup and the Deromes had passed away, and the revolution effectually killed whatever knowledge remained of the ancient skill of the booklinders. Half a century later saw its revival in France, and the art has since flourished both there and on English soil.—London Spectator.

How Beetles Defend Themselves.

Beetles have other defenses than their curious, such as nauseous or caustic fluids, which they exude for protection, and, strange to say, certain beetles actually exude their blood, charged with insecticide properties. This blood is confined to the chrysomelidae, some of the tinamchae and adamsoia, the coccinellidae and the meloidae. The blood of the coccinellidae has a strong, disagreeable odor like that of the whole insect. That of the meloidae is not odorless, but has an astringent flavor. And in the case of the Tinamchae primeli- odes is conspicuous. The blood of the meloidae contains much cantharidine.

A Problem in Golf.

Two young ladies were making their first essay at golf. "Dear me," said the first young lady, "what shall I do now? My ball is in a hole." The second young lady took out a book of instructions. "Let me see," she said, turning the pages. "I presume you must now take a stick of the right shape and put it out." "Oh, yes, of course," said the first young woman. "See if you can find me a stick shaped like a dustpan and brush."

He Stuck to It.

Her Husband—If a man steals—no matter what it is—he will live to regret it. His Wife—During our courtship you used to steal kisses from me. Her Husband—Well, you heard what I said.

Prisoner—I'll reform, judge, if you'll give me time. Judge—All right. I'll give you thirty days.

Philosophy is a good horse in the stable, but an errant jade on a journey.—Goldsmith.

IMPURE FOODS.
Tricks of the Trades Recorded by a Diarist of 1783.
"The pure food question is as old," said an antiquary, "as the hills."
He took down a volume bound in gray calf.
"This is the diary," he said, "of Heinrich Cruger, born in Amsterdam in 1724; died in New York in 1870. Listen to the pure food kick that Henry put up in 1782."
The antiquary read:
"Monday, 16th October—If I would drink water I must quaff the mawkish contents of a cursed open aqueduct, exposed to all manner of defilement and impregnated with all the filth of the town.
"As for the intoxicating-potion sold as wine, it is a vile, unpalatable and pernicious sophistication, bakerdashed with cider, corn-spirit and the juice of sloes.
"The bread is a deleterious paste, mixed up with chalk, alum and lead ashes, inalpid to the taste and destructive to the constitution.
"The table beer, guiltless of hops or malt, is vapid and nauseous. The tallowy, rancid mass called butter is manufactured of candle grease and kitchen stuff. The fresh eggs were fresh ouce.
"The greens are boiled with brass halfpence in order to improve their color, while the pickles, though very inviting to the eye, are often insupportably rank to the taste, the reason being that in their case also the housewife has boiled a shilling's worth or two of halfpence or a pound brass weight in the vinegar."

THE MORNING WAKING.

Getting Up Exercises That Will Put the Brain In Order.

The difficulty most people experience in getting up in the morning can be easily overcome by a simple exercise, according to a medical authority. After the sleep the long rest the brain is laden with somewhat impure blood, and the lymph vessels which remove waste matter are overfull and sluggish. This is why we all crave another ten minutes in bed and why most people are so morose at breakfast. Very slowly the brain gets rid of the matter which interfere with its vigorous action, but the process can be expedited.

If the finger tips are placed against the neck just under the ear and moved swiftly down to the front of the shoulder along the course of the jugular vein, the used up blood is drawn away and room left for a fresh supply. This should be done twice at each side of the neck. Then the hands should be placed on the back of the neck just under the skull and moved downward as far as possible. This clears out the lymph vessels and effectually prevents swollen glands, from which so many people suffer.

After two brisk rubs of the lymph vessels return to the jugular veins and then back to the glands, half a dozen or eight times, until the operation will be found far better than a cup of coffee, and whenever the brain is dull through congestion this massage will be equally effective.

Miss, Mrs. and Mistress.

"Miss" is an abbreviation of "mistress," which, as an English law dictionary explains, is the proper style of the wife of an esquire or a gentleman. But Dr. Johnson's time it had become "the term of honor to a young girl." In the earlier part of the eighteenth century, however, it was used respectfully of girls below the age of ten alone. After that age "miss" was rude, implying giddiness of behavior. In Smollett's writings an unmarried woman of mature years and high rank is called "Mrs." It is certain that "miss" has grown older, so to speak, while "master" has become confined to boys.

Danger in Linoleum Making.

In the manufacture of linoleum no unprotected lights are allowed in the mixing department. This is on account of the great danger of exploding the cork dust floating in the air. An additional danger in linoleum making is that the mixture of cement and cork dust has the unpleasant property of spontaneously igniting if left in a warm place. It is therefore customary to mix the material a sackful at a time in order to reduce the risks of an explosion.

A Figure of Speech.

"Dad," inquired Freddy, "what is a 'figure of speech?'"

"Where's your mother?" asked dad cautiously.

"She's downstairs," answered the boy.

"Well, then," began dad, "a figure of speech, my son, is a woman."

A Paradox of Poets.

"Poets have always had scanty encouragement."

"Yes," answered the sad eyed youth with inky fingers. "The idea seems to be that poetry is something everybody ought to read and nobody ought to write."

THE THIRD HOUSE.

Legislative Annex of the Special Interests in Congress.

The third house, as the lobby is sometimes called, is the legislative annex of the special interests. It is the house of special representatives, and its membership is a curious study in the widely differed.

Its meeting place is the lobby and committee rooms of the nation's capitol, the hotel rotunda, the lawyer's office, the street, the banquet room, the little back room, the bar, the road house, the home, the brothel—anywhere the legislator may be found and personally approached. That is the object of a lobby—personal contact with the people's representatives and the influence upon legislation worked thereby.

If legislators were perfect, there would be no lobby. If they were perfectly wise, there would be no occasion for the lobbyist who desires "to inform" them; if perfectly honest, there would be no occasion for the lobbyist who desires to "make it worth while." If perfectly patriotic, there would be no occasion for the lobbyist who desires for himself "a little personal favor"—at the people's expense. The existence of a lobby is premised on human frailty. It is present to prey on human weakness, to warp the action of the legislative body by appeal to vanity, ignorance, cupidity or fear.—Gilson Gardner in Success Magazine.

HARDY FERNS.

About Forty Species Are Suited to Outdoor Culture.

Among the hardy ferns are varieties greatly differing in size and form, from a hairlike evergreen stem bearing a few simple moslike leaves to the vigorous growing plants with large leaves, attaining a height of two or three feet. Ferns are interesting and extremely beautiful, especially when grown as specimen plants or in combination with other plants. The varying conditions in which the different species exceed are remarkable. Many of them require a warm temperature, while others do well in cool and shady places.

Of the 4,000 or more species of ferns not more than about forty species are suited to outdoor culture in ordinary soils and situations. These species can be planted in beds, borders or rockeries or in the foreground of shrubbery. As most of them require a somewhat shady place, they are especially useful for filling in places where grass and other light loving plants cannot grow. Perfect drainage is required. The soil should have two parts of loam to one part of well decayed sod will answer.

Hardy ferns are best planted in the spring, but they can be planted in the summer if the fronds or leaves are cut back, making it easier for the plants to establish themselves before the winter sets in. From his florist the amateur gardener can obtain cuttings of varieties most suitable for the soil and climate in his vicinity. In the winter the ferns should be given protection, with a covering of leaves, hay or straw.

Respected His Scruples.

In the mathematics class one day at Williams college Professor S., who was rarely made the subject of college jests, was excessively annoyed by some man "squeaking" a small rubber bladder. The noise seemed to come from near a certain Jack Hollis, who after querying each of his neighbors and receiving a negative answer Professor S. said sternly:

"Hollis, do you know who is making that unbearable noise?"

Hollis, who had been the guilty person all along, assumed an air of stoical bravery and said calmly, "I know, sir, but I prefer not to tell."

Professor S.'s angry face grew calmer, and with evident pleasure he replied: "I respect your scruples, Hollis. They do you credit and should shame the guilty man, sir."

John Milton's Cottage.

One of the best preserved historic country houses is all England is that of Milton's cottage at Chalfont St. Giles, to which the blind and aging poet fled when the great plague swept London on London. That was in July, 1665, and Milton had just finished "Paradise Lost" and received a five pound note for it, with a promise of three more five pound notes if the poem sold four editions of 1,500 copies each. The cottage stands at the top of the village, and it is to practically the same condition as when Milton left it. Here the poet received his distinguished guests during the latter part of his life.

THE BRITISH BREAKFAST.

Trying In Its Monotony, Though the Food Is Substantial.

A distinguished author once described an unripe persimmon as a fine laxative to generosity, since we would rather give it to another than eat it ourselves. And perhaps the English breakfast may be likened to the early persimmon.

Monotony is the keynote of the early meal in a British household—not but that the food is good and substantial, but there is a sameness about it and year out about the dishes that is trying indeed to an American. Here is a list of establishes and families dining in and from the breakfast menu of ten middle class English households and ten purely English hotels:

Porridge, served with sugar and milk; ham and eggs, eggs and bacon, grilled ham, boiled and poached eggs, fried sausages, dried fish (herrings or haddock), dry toast, white or brown bread and butter, marmalade or jam, tea or coffee.

The man or woman who has been accustomed to break the fast with wheat cakes and maple sirup, followed by grilled bluefish and a juicy porterhouse or sirloin steak, chopped out by freshly ground coffee, cranberry jelly, Virginian honey and a choice of a buckwheat or more delights in the way of bread and freshly baked cakes, sits down to breakfast in England with a sigh.

Knew His Place.

The village carpenter had given so generously of his services and sound advice toward rebuilding the little memorial chapel that when it was completed all the summer people agreed that he should be asked to speak after the luncheon which was to follow the dedication exercises. The day and the carpenter's turn came duly.

"Ladies and gentlemen, dear friends," he began, his good brown face very red indeed, "I am a good deal better fitted for the scaffold than for public speaking."

Then he realized what he had said and sat down amid roars of laughter.

A Curiosity About Eclipses.

The average number of total and partial eclipses in any one year is four, the maximum seven and the minimum two. There is nothing really peculiar in this except the fact that where only two occur they are always both of the sun. There are more solar than lunar eclipses, but the sun being so much larger than the earth or moon the shadow terminates in a point and is visible only along a narrow track, while the lunar obscuration is frequently visible over half a continent.

Where Beggars Ride.

"If widows were horses beggars would ride," says the old saw. But in Persia beggars actually do ride, although they patronize the humble donkey instead of his more aristocratic brother. How they manage to obtain these useful animals or even to exist themselves passes European comprehension, but the fact remains that they do both.—Wide World Magazine.

Enforcing the Law.

"What are they moving the church for?"

"Well, stranger, I'm mayor of these diggin's, an' I'm for law enforcement. We've put an ordinance what says no saloon shall be nearer than 300 feet to a church. I gave 'em three days to move the church."

PALE AS A CORPSE.
DR. WILLIAMS' PINK PILLS BROUGHT BACK THE RUDDY GLOW OF HEALTH.
Thousands of young growing girls have pale, pasty complexions; distressing headaches, backaches and sideaches. Sometimes they are unable to sleep; their nerves are unstrung; they are languid; breathless and the heart palpitates violently at the least exertion—that's anaemia —and it may develop into consumption unless promptly attended to. Anaemia means bloodlessness. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills make pure, red blood—that's the secret of their success. Miss Minnie Winn, Montreal, Que., says:—"I was so weak and run down that my friends thought I was going into consumption. I was as pale as corpse, had no appetite, and did not sleep well. The least exertion tired me out and if I walked a few blocks I was almost breathless. My sister induced me to take Dr. Williams' Pink Pills and after using them for a few weeks I am again enjoying good health and have a good color. I think every weak, sickly girl should take Dr. Williams' Pink Pills."
Dr. Williams' Pink Pills make new, rich blood and in this way strike right at the root of such troubles as anaemia, indigestion, rheumatism, St. Vitus dance, the secret ills of girlhood and womanhood and a host of other every day troubles and cure them. But you must get the genuine with the full name, Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People' on the wrapper around every box — imitations never cured any one and sometimes they do much harm. If your dealer does not keep the genuine Pills they will be sent at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

FIRED ONLY JOKES.

The Way Judge Thacher Dodged a Challenge to a Duel.

Documents in the Congressional library at Washington show that when the establishment of the mint was rather general in the United States time there were some amusing debates in congress concerning the devices the coins should bear. There is one account of a squabble over the design for the silver dollar.

It appears that a member of the house from a southern state bitterly opposed the choice of the eagle on account of its being the "king of birds," and hence neither suitable nor proper to represent a nation whose institutions and interests were wholly inimical to monarchical forms of government.

Judge Thacher in reply had playfully suggested that perhaps a goose might suit the gentleman, as it was rather a humble and republican bird and would also nevertheless be available for "sauce," as the goslings would answer to place upon the dimes.

This reply created considerable merriment, and the irate southerner, considering the humorous rejoinder an insult, sent a challenge to Judge Thacher, who proudly declined it. The bearer, rather astonished, asked, "Will you be kind enough to tell me why?"

"Certainly, if he pleases," replied Thacher. "I always was one, and he knew it, or he would never have risked a challenge."

The affair caused much mirth, but was finally hushed, cordial relations being restored, the irritable southerner concluding that there was nothing to be gained by fighting one who fired nothing but jokes.

The alm of most "cures" for Rheumatism seems to be to relieve the pain. When they have done that, their usefulness is gone. And the next time you take cold, or your feet get wet, or you over-exert yourself, back comes the pain.

Bu-Ju The Gentle Kidney Pill

is different. It does relieve the pain, as quickly as the best linaments. But it does more than that. It REMOVES THE CAUSE of Rheumatism, and in the blood.

Every drop of blood passes through the Kidneys. These organs should filter out impurities. When they are weak, inflamed or diseased, the impurities stay in the blood and are carried to the sensitive nerves, and the trouble is simply this irritated nerves, aggravated by uric acid and other impurities being dashed upon them—their favorite target being the joints and muscles. Make the Kidneys filter the blood properly, keep the blood pure and rich, and there can be no Rheumatism. Bu-Ju does this.

Bu-Ju is an unconditional guarantee. They will cure you or money refunded. At all druggists, 50c. a large box, or mailed on receipt of price.

HEALTH HINTS.

Several children occupying a small room, often with windows closed, are likely to grow into pale, irritable men and women. Pure air is a cleanser of the blood. It is a nerve builder, and need not all seasons of the year, day and night.

If the boys are caught in a spring shower see that they come to the house and change clothing, though they are only damp. Then a good rubbing and dry clothes will make of the shower a benefit. While damp clothes may leave no visible ill effects such exposure is always slowly wearing away the foundation of health.

Keep the boy well supplied with rubber boots. If this is thought a needless expense, because the parents didn't have rubber boots at his age, then turn him barefoot, as the father went when a boy, as the dampness is less dangerous than when held in leather.

Keep the woolens on the delicate and all summer. Get light-weight non-irritating articles and no inconvenience will be felt.

Every morning fill the lungs at least twenty times with the pure outdoor air. Take it always through the nostrils.

A REMARKABLE INVENTION FOR THE Culture of Hair

THE EVANS VACUUM CAP is a practical invention constructed on scientific and hygienic principles by the simple means of which a free and normal circulation is excited throughout the scalp. The minute blood vessels are gently stimulated to activity, thus allowing the food supply which can only be derived from the blood, to be carried to the hair roots, the effects of which are quickly seen in a healthy, vigorous growth of hair. There is no rubbing, and as no drugs or chemicals of whatsoever kind are employed there is nothing to cause irritation. It is only necessary to wear the Cap three or four minutes daily.

60 DAYS' FREE TRIAL. The Company's Guarantee.

AN EVANS VACUUM CAP will be sent you for thirty days' free trial. If you do not see a gradual development of a new growth of hair, and are not entirely satisfied that the Cap will restore your hair, you are at liberty to return it to us at our expense whatever to yourself. It is requested, as an evidence of good faith, that a deposit be furnished with the Guaranty Bond, which deposit Company will return the moment the unaltered institution of the kind in the world, who will issue a receipt guaranteeing that the money will be returned in full, on demand without question or comment, at any time during the trial period.

The eminent Dr. I. N. LOVE, in his address to the Medical Board on the subject of Alopecia Risa of hair stated that if a means could be devised to bring nutrition to the hair follicles their roots without resorting to any irritating process, and which would be free from any injurious effects, the EVANS VACUUM CUP was submitted to him for inspection, he remarked that the Cap would fulfil and confirm in practice the observations he had previously made before the Medical Board.

Dr. W. MOORE, referring to the invention, says that the principle upon which the Evans Vacuum Cap is founded is absolutely correct and indisputable.

An illustrated and descriptive book of the Evans Vacuum Cap will be sent, post free, on application.

THE SECRETARY, EVANS VACUUM CAP CO., LTD., REGENT HOUSE, REGENT STREET, LONDON, W.

DR. ORONHYATEKHA.

A despatch from New York says: Gayogeroah, the "Fair Flower" of the Mohawk tribe, was the complainant in Yorkville court, against Oronhyatekha, or "Bright Cloud," a full-blooded Mohawk. "Fair Flower" told Magistrate Finn she had been cast aside.

The prisoner, whose full name is Dr. Arthur Oronhyatekha, is "a son of the doctor chief of the tribe, best known by his American name, Peter Martin," who was the founder of the Independent Order of Foresters. The doctor was arrested at the Ashland house, on a warrant sworn out by the complainant, who says she is his wife and that her name is Mrs. Natalie Oronhyatekha.

When the woman applied for the warrant to Magistrate Finn she told him she was an English actress when five years' ago she met the man whom she believed to be an Indian prince. He had no difficulty in persuading her in a short time to join the Mohawk tribe as his bride. They were married in Sutton, England, she said, on April 22d, 1897.

She told the magistrate that they were happy for five years, when he left her to go to Australia. Since then she had been seen him until this week.

The prisoner said he had been married to complainant, as alleged, but was divorced four years ago. The woman said she never had been served with papers in such a suit, and knew nothing about it. The doctor and Miss Martin were married again, and his wife, who was Therese Henrike Hansen when he married her in South Dakota, was expecting to meet him in Rotterdam.

Magistrate Finn adjourned the case until next Tuesday, paroling the prisoner in the custody of his counsel.

LAWS FOR A JAPANESE BRIDE.

Upon her wedding morning the Japanese bride is given twelve commandments by her mother. These twelve rules have been handed down from mother to daughter in Japan for centuries, and no well-bred girl disregards them. What would an American girl say if her mother should give her the following directions:

The moment you are married you are no longer my daughter. Therefore, you must obey your parents-at-law as you once obeyed your father and mother.

When you are married your husband will be your sole master. Be humble and polite. Strict obedience to her husband is the noblest virtue a wife can possess.

Always be amiable toward your mother-in-law.

Do not be jealous. Jealousy kills your husband's affection for you.

Even though your husband be wrong, do not get angry. Be patient, and when he has calmed down speak to him gently.

Do not talk too much. Speak no evil of your neighbors. Never tell lies.

Consult no fortune teller.

Be a good manager-ess, and especially be economical in your household.

Do not pride yourself on your father's rank or wealth. He is a rich man never allude to his riches before your husband's relations.

Although you may marry young do not frequent too youthful society. Do not wear bright colored garments. Always be neatly but modestly dressed.

Rise early, retire late, and do not sleep in the afternoon. Drink little wine, and until you are 50 take no part in public assemblies nor mingle in crowds.

NEWBRO'S HERPICIDE

It is now possible for everyone to have healthy and rich looking hair, by using Newbro's Herpicide, the ORIGINAL remedy that "kills the dandruff germ."

The presence of the dandruff germ in the scalp causes first, dull, brittle and lustreless hair, with later, dandruff, itching scalp and falling hair. All these disagreeable symptoms will disappear, and the hair grow as nature intended, if the dandruff germ is destroyed and kept out of the scalp. Don't wait for chronic baldness, for it is incurable. Herpicide stops itching of the scalp, almost instantly.

"I cannot speak too highly for Newbro's Herpicide; it keeps my hair and scalp in excellent condition."

EARLY MORNING BLAZE.

Quite a serious fire occurred on Piety Hill, about 5 o'clock last Saturday morning. It started in Mr. Jas. Brandon's barn, and no other cause can be assigned than that the remnants of a rocket fired off in some part of the town the night before had found lodgment in the barn and caused the fire. Mr. T. H. Wallace gave the alarm, and the firemen were promptly on the spot, but before the flames were extinguished considerable damage was done. Mr. Brandon's barn and contents, Mrs. Casey's barn and the Misses Kimmerly's summer kitchen were destroyed. The fire also caught in Mr. Kimmerly's house, and two rooms were badly scorched and deluged with water. The south side of Mr. Brandon's house was also badly scorched. The losses are—Mrs. Casey, $300; Misses Kimmerly, $700, and Mr. Brandon, $900.

Oddfellowship.

G. A. CLIFF PRESENTED WITH VETERAN'S JEWEL.

Tuesday night last was a red letter night in Oddfellows circles, and especially with Napanee Lodge No. 86 and Red Rose Lodge 376. Enterprise, the brothers of the latter lodge having come to Napanee bringing twelve candidates for degrees, which were conferred by the degree teams of Napanee Lodge in the manner which has earned for them their enviable reputation. After the degree work was finished Bro. Pringle called Bro. G. A. Cliff to his chair and presented him with a Veteran's Jewel, while Bro. C. Frizzell read the following address:

Bro. George A. Cliff, P.G.,

Napanee Lodge, No. 86, I.O.O.F.

Dear Sir & Brother,—You, along with many other esteemed members of the Order, have worked faithfully and laboriously to advance the interests of Oddfellowship and the lodge over which you have played in building up Napanee Lodge No. 86, I.O.O.F., has always gained our admiration and now calls forth an expression of our deepest gratitude.

Under the law governing our body you are entitled by reason of your twenty-five years membership in the order to a Veteran's Jewel, and this jewel is now presented to you with a great deal more pleasure than we know how to express. We hope you will wear it as a true Oddfellow for the remainder of your days, which we pray may be many long, useful and happy ones, especially as a worthy Oddfellow, and that it may recall from time to time the many pleasant associations which have heretofore and which we trust will hereafter exist between you and the members of this lodge and of the order.

The practice of the principles of Oddfellowship calls for a never ceasing pain nor and betokens an absence of weariness in well doing. "Consistency thou art a jewel" can well be said to Oddfellows without sarcasm, for with the few exceptions the bonds of brotherhood in the Independent Order of Oddfellows continue even unto death. More especially can this be said to you in friendship, love and truth, for consistency in your case is now exemplified by the veteran's jewel.

Dated at Napanee this fourteenth day of May, 1907.

Signed on behalf of Napanee Lodge No. 16, I.O.O.F.,

J. A. PRINGLE, Noble Grand.
CHAS. FRIZZELL, Rec. Secretary.

Bro. Cliff, in response to calls for a speech, in feeling words thanked the lodge for the magnificent jewel and the kind address. He claimed that while he was proud of his long association with the order and had worked faithfully, yet there had been a great deal of pleasure as it for himself and he had the satisfaction of knowing he had only been doing his duty.

Adjournment was then made to the supper room where the visiting brethren were entertained with refreshments, and a most list was proceeded with and proposals and responses were made and replied to by the brethren present. The members dispersed at an early hour, voting it a night of a great deal of pleasure.

BEATEN BY HER FATHER.

On Tuesday afternoon, about 3 o'clock Chief Graham was summoned to the home of Geo. Ferrington, West Napanee, on a complaint made by a neighbor that he was inhumanely beating his little daughter Ethel, aged six years. On the chief's arrival he found the little girl and an idiotic brother, aged about eight years, in her care, the father having gone down town. The mother is not living at home, having left some years ago, and the children have been left alone to keep house. They were taken in charge by Chief Graham, and later in the day Ferrington was taken into custody and placed in the lock-up. He was given a hearing on Wednesday night before Police Magistrate Ponton, the two medical men giving evidence as to the condition of the little girl, and then went to show that she was beaten with a stick or some other heavy weapon. There were some sixteen bruises on the child's body 24 hours after. Ferrington elected to be tried by the Judge, and in the meantime he was placed in a cell awaiting his trial. The Children's Aid Society now have the children under their care pending an order from the court. The prisoner has done time in Central Prison before, having been released about two years ago. Chief Graham says he has seen men whipped in prison for crime, but has never witnessed a more frightful bruising than what this six-year-old little girl bears.

touch, she put one hand on his shoulder, the other on his left arm. Hundreds of times this caressing touch had quieted Chilcote.

"Dear old boy!" she said soothingly, her hand moving slowly down his arm. In a flash of understanding the circumstances of his position came to him. Action was imperative, at whatever risk. With an abrupt gesture he rose. The movement was awkward. He got to his feet precipitately. Lillian Lodge, surprised and startled, rose involuntarily at his left hand to steady her position.

His fingers grasped at, then held his. He made no effort to release them. With a changed acknowledgment, he addressed the chauffeur.

How long she stayed immovable, holding his hand, neither of them knew. The pressure of a woman's instinct is so obscure, that it would be futile to apply it to the commonplace rules of time. She kept her head fenced, as though his fingers possessed peculiar virtue. Then all but she

"John, Jacky!" she said very slowly, under the two short words a whole world of tenderness and surprise made a unity.

She laughed.

Her hand she dropped his hand and drew from her knees. What her action was, what her instincts were she could not clearly defined, let her self-consciousness was submerged in utter unhesitation. Without a doubt's uncertainty she turned to the window, grasped the electric button and flooded the room with light.

There is no fairer so demoralizing as artificial light. Lodge took a step forward, his hand hanging unemployed at his side, and Lillian, stepping back, caught it again before he could protest. Lifting it quickly, she looked intimately at the two rings, the wedding ring and the heavy, extraordinary lover soldier, they were hurt. Seeing only what Lillian was seeing, only what she knew, no doubt have staked a definite opinion, but the other sex takes a different view. A side-road grazing at the time of twilights and her conclusions spoil. Should her mind like arrows all aimed at the same point. Lodge remembered the day when she and Chilcote had talked of duelings, her action and his excitement defined the idea. His sudden interest in the "Esther Monk's Shoes," and his theories about the duel. He had its science and of duties. She remembered her self convinced recognition of the fact that he had set her in the door of her sister's house, and, last of all remembered Chilcote's unsuccessful effort to explain the position of Blokesses when she had met him at yesterday driving through the park. And now his unnecessarily repudiation of his former opinion. She reviewed each item, then looked slowly and looked

She prepared for the glance and straightened the fiery mound and eyes searched his face it was not he who changed color. "Tell me," she said very slowly, "what happened when you were wearing his clothes and driving in his voice, but you are not a liar, Jacky." Her voice quivered with a touch of excitement. "You would, keep quiet and look at me," she said, "and you would tell what I am saying, though I don't understand it. I have no real regret." She discovered by her companion's silent and steady gaze, and in the pause a curious and unexpected thing occurred.

Lodge laughed suddenly—a full, confident, reassured laugh. All the web of doubt he had cast for his upon about him all the intolerable sense of an impending disaster lifted suddenly. He was very clever, and it was for his mind beyond his eyes.

Holding to her, he smiled—a smile of relaxed determination, such as he had never worn in his life, with a calm gesture he released

Lillian involuntarily

"Why do you say that?" she said.

"Because I am not a liar," he said, "and I shall not be. Why should I? Why should I? Why should I?"

Lodge drew his hand from his mouth and the tone in which rising to a pitch of incredulity. "Do you realize that, Jacky? Do you realize that, Jacky?"

"Yes," he said.

"I will not hear you," he said, "I will not hear you."

"I will not admit," he said, "I will not admit. My blood is cold, somewhat cold, but I am not going to admit to you, or to myself, at this moment that you have a fact that I haven't worn your will scarcely interest me."

"I will not admit—to me, that you are a liar."

"Nothing—and admit nothing. Are you congratulations."

"Yes."

"Possession—your imagination."

"Yes."

"Then by a single fact. Then by a fact she conquered her temper. "Are you to be wrong?" she said, "I am a fresh touch of excitement. "Let me see your rings and let me see your hand."

A deliberate gesture Lodge put his hand behind his back. "I never like childish curiosity," he said, with another smile.

Then a flash of temper crossed her eyes. "Are you sure," she said, "that it's quite wise to talk like that?"

Lodge laughed again. "Is that a threat?"

"Perhaps."

"Then it's an empty one."

"Why?"

Before replying he waited a moment, looking down at her.

"I conclude," he began quietly, "that your idea is to spend this wild, ridiculous story—to ask people to believe that John Chilcote, whom they see before them, is not John Chilcote, but somebody else. Now, you'll find that a harder task than you imagine. This is a skeptical world, and people are absurdly fond of their own eyesight. We are all journalists nowadays—fe all against facts. The first thing you will be asked for is your proof. And what does that consist of? The circumstance that John Chilcote, who has always despised jewelry, has lately taken to wearing rings? Your own testimony unattended by any witnesses, that with those rings off his finger bears a scar belonging to another man? No, on close examination I scarcely imagine that your case would hold."

He stopped, fired by his own facile. The future might be Chilcote's, but the present was his, and this present, with its immeasurable possibilities, had been rescued from catastrophe. "No," he said again, "when you get your proof perhaps we'll have another talk, but till then"—

"Till then?" She looked up quickly, but almost at once her question died away.

The door had opened, and the servant who had admitted Lodge stood in the opening.

"Dinner is served!" he announced in his deferential voice.

CHAPTER XXIII.

AND Lodge dined with Lillian Astrupp. We live in an age when society expects, even exacts, such freaks. He dined, not through bravado and not through cowardice, but because it seemed the obvious, the only thing to do. To him a course of any description was distasteful. To Judith it was unknown. In her world people bored or hated, were spiteful or foolish, were even quixotic or clubmonable, but they seldom made scenes. Lodge hastily saw and tacitly accepted this.

Possibly they ate extremely little during the course of the dinner and talked extraordinarily much on subjects that interested neither, but the main point it kept well in mind. They dined. The conventionalities were appropriate to things. The silent, watchful servants who waited on them were given no food for comment. The first that Lodge or left immediately after dinner, the fact that he glanced on the doorstep before the hall door had closed behind him and drew a long, deep breath of relief, held only an individual significance and therefore did not count.

On reaching Chilcote's house he passed at once to the study. Now that he was in face of this tangible, fabulous interest. "You are not wearing," he said very slowly, "the clothes and you are wearing his clothes and driving in his voice, but you are not John Chilcote." His quietness was pierced with a touch of excitement. "You would, keep quiet and look at me," he has more weight than the whole east-ern question." It had been arranged that, following the customary proce-dure, Loder was to rise after question at the morning sitting and ask leave to move the adjournment of the house on a definite matter of urgent public im-portance, upon which leave having been granted by the rising of forty members in his support—the way was to lie open for his definite attack at the evening sitting. And it was with a mind attuned to this perfect action that he retired to the study imme-diately he had breakfasted and settled his final revision of his speech before an early party conference should com-pel him to leave the house. But here again circumstance was destined to change his programme. Scarcely had he sorted his notes and drawn his chair to Chiltoite's desk than Hamlet entered the room with the same air of im-portant haste that he had shown on a previous occasion.

"A letter from Mr. Fraide, sir. But there's no answer," he said, with un-usual brevity.

Loder waited till he had left the room; then he tore the letter open. He read:

My Dear Chiltoite—Lakeley is the re-cipient of special and very vital news from Bengal—unofficial, but one she has shrewdness. Acts of Russian aggres-sion toward British troops are reported to be rapidly increasing, and it is stated that the authority of the executive is flouted with contempt. Pendine a possi-ble ultimatum. This would suggest that you keep an open mind on the sub-ject of tonight's speech. Regarding an ultimatum—even an unprepared—atti-tude you may be sure my party will be strengthened. I shall put my opinions be-fore you more explicitly at the earliest opportunity.

HERBERT FRAIDE.

The letter, worded with Fraide's usu-al restraint, made a strong impression on its recipient. The thought that his speech might not only express opinions already tacitly held, but voice a situa-tion of intense and national impor-tance, struck him with full force. For many minutes after he had grasped the meaning of Fraide's message he sat regardful of his notes, his elbows resting on the desk, his face between his hands, stirred by the suggestion that here might be a greater opportu-nity than any he had anticipated.

Still moved by this new suggestion, he attended the party conclave that Fraide had convened and afterward lunched with and accompanied his leader to the house. They spoke very little as they drove to Westminster, for each was engrossed by his own thoughts. Only once did Fraide allude to the incident that was paramount in both their minds. Then, turning to Loder with a look of encouragement, he laid his fingers for an instant on on his arm.

"Chiltoite," he had said, "when the time comes, remember you have all my confidence."

Looking back upon that day, Loder often wondered at the calmness with which he bore the uncertainty. To sit apparently unmoved and with almost emotion for more than the long afternoon in Chiltoite's place, obeying the dictates of his chief. But if the day was fraught with difficulties for him it was fraught with dullness and disappointment for others, for the un-couraged interest that had stirred at the Easter adjournment and risen with lighted force on this first day of the new session was gradually but surely threatened with extinction an hour after hour passed bringing no suggestion of a battle that had on every side been tacitly expected. Slowly and unmistakably speculation and dissatisfaction crept into the at-mosphere of the house as moment suc-ceeded moment and the opposition made no sign. Was Fraide shirking the attack or was he playing a waiting game? Again and again the question arose, first in the air with a passing flicker of interest, but each time it sprang up only to die down again as the ordinary business of the day drag-ged itself out.

Gradually, as the afternoon wore on, daylight began to fade. Lately, sitting rigidly in Chiltoite's place, watched with suppressed inquiry the faces of the men who entered through the con-stantly swinging doors, but not one face, no eagerly scanned, carried the message for which he waited. Monot-onously and mechanically the time passed. The government, adopting a neutral attitude, carefully skirted all dangerous subjects, while the opposi-tion, acting under Fraide's suggestion, assisted in the process and hastened the pro-gramme of postponement. For the mo-ment the eagerly anticipated resson-bling threatened to die down, and it was with a universal movement of weariness and relief that at last the house rose to dine.

But there are no possibilities so elas-tic as those of politics. At half past 7 the house rose in a spirit of boredom and disappointment, and at 9 o'clock the lobbies, the dining room, the entire space of the vast building, was stirred into activity by the arrival of a sing-telegraphic message.

The new development for which Fraide had waited came indeed, but it came with a force he had little antici-pated. With a thrill of awe and con-sternation men heard and repeated the astounding news that, while personal-ity exercising his authority on behalf of British traders, Sir William Brice-Field, consul general at Meshed, had been fired at by a Russian officer and instantly killed.

The interval immediately following the receipt of this news was too con-fused for detailed remembrance. Two ideas made themselves slowly felt—a deep horror that such an event could excite itself upon our high civilization and a strong personal dismay that so honored, distinguished and veteran-ed a representative as Sir William Brice-Field could have been allowed to meet death in so terrible a manner.

It was in the consciousness of this feeling, the consciousness that in his own person he might voice not only the feelings of his party, but those of the whole country, that Loder rose an hour later to make his long delayed attack.

He stood silent for a moment, as he had done on an earlier occasion, but this time his motive was different. Honse beyond any feeling of self con-sciousness, he waited as by right for the full attention of the house; then quietly, but with self possessed fire-ness, he moved the motion for adjourn-ment.

Like a match to a train of powder the words set flame to the excitement that had smoldered for weeks, and in an atmosphere charged with a percep-tence of such tense and vital concen-tration as the house has rarely wit-nessed upon the leaves of odd rock by the sharp pencil of the light-ning. Her broad manuscripts are of-ten like the sands of the seashore washed clean at least once a day by the inflowing tides. They are the blackboards in the schoolroom of a lit-tle child. The written words of the morning are obliterated by the teacher to make room for the arithmetic class and the figures of the afternoon. What we do and say to-day may be swal-lowed up in the great, deep, impene-trable abyss of oblivion of what we will do and say to-morrow.

Indeed, if it might use the illustra-tion, memory has always seemed to me to be like a French bastile. It is similar to a great walled in castle of chivalric times. It is filled with secret closets and secret rooms and secret subterranean passages. It has its treasure vaults, where are concealed the precious stones and the gold and the silver no one knows anything about. It has its cedar chests where the fabled brides have hidden their wedding robes and where families hide their decomposed grinning skele-tons, so that no one may find them, yet there memory stands a huge castle with her watch towers and her moats and her drawbridges and her banquet halls and her ballrooms and her cor-lars and also with her secret cham-bers, about the contents of which even the owners themselves have forgot-ten.

Perhaps I can illustrate my thought even more simply than this. A very dear friend of mine is the owner of one of the most historic of Virginia mansions. Every one conversant with the history of Washington's community wealth knows about Westover, the home of the famous Colonel William Byrd of James River. One day some few years ago my friend was making some repairs in his cellar. Accidently the pick of the workman went through the wall. A large opening was made through the wall. Lights were brought. Then my friend entered and found a secret tunnel, which old Col-onel Byrd had built leading from his mansion down to the river bank. Through which if necessary in times of danger he and his family could have escaped and fled to the coast or to England. Thus memory's castles have their secret hidden clos-et chambers and secret subterranean passages. We ourselves have built them. We have built them so well that we have shut the secret doors which lead to them and to the contents of their very existence. What we said and did as boys, where we went as young men, the warnings and advice we have received in the past, may be swallowed up in the great sea of for-getfulness. Memory held these in tight grip for a little while, but memory's vigilance fell after a time more less and less strong. Now they have slip-ped out of her hands. They will be lost to us forever unless some one opens for us memory's secret cham-bers and says: "Friend, look in there, here are your treasures."

I have no fear that I shall ever for-get. Especially by bitter ex-perience he had learned how easy it was to forget the mercies and kind-nesses with which God had surround-ed him in his past life. No sooner had God rescued him from Saul's javelin than the shepherd boy fled to King Achish's court, thinking he would be safer with his country's enemies than with Saul. Hardly had God seated him firmly upon the Hebrew throne than David forgot all of God's mercies and care. He signed a death warrant on his country's wars. He made love to Bakhsheba, another man's wife. He then murdered her husband. According to Nathan's parable, he killed the poor man's lamb. Ah, but David knew what it was in his prosperity to forget the love and the mercy and the protection of God. Today we find him opening the one hundred and third psalm with practically these words: "O God, do not let me forget what thou hast done for me." He thus bids us study "Gospel Mnemonics," or the laws by which we shall be able to hold in tablet grip the remembrances of the benefits with which God sur-rounds our lives now, as he has done during our past years. "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is with-in me bless his holy name. Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits."

How is the psalmist's prayer to be answered in my life? First, by clear-ly and distinctly and emphatically getting an impression of the benefits upon my mind and heart so that I can remember the benefits of what God has done for me and my dear ones. By clearly and distinctly grasp-ing in the first place what God is, and God is just, and God is gentle and kind and forgiving. By having my consciousness aroused so that the thoughts which are peopling the tem-ple of my brain today, as messen-gers may be recognised as individ-duals next week, next month, next year, as I go about my daily occupa-tions. If God's blessings do not make a deep impression upon the mind and heart, then memory, even though strong, will have nothing to remem-ber.

If I might use a familiar illustra-tion, we must deal with the scrolls of memory as the phonograph maker or owner makes the records for his in-struments. You have often seen him do it. He takes a round cylinder of wax. Then on the surface of this cylinder of wax he places a little needle. Then attached to this needle he has a huge trumpet. Then at the other end of the trumpet he orchestra starts the waves of sound. These sound waves surge into the open mouth of that trumpet and drive the needle into the revolv-ing wax, and the impression is made. Then by these indentations the phono-graph is able to sound forth for you the songs of a Gadsby or a Melba, the stringed instrument playing of a Theodore Thomas orchestra, the ora-tion of a Depew or a Bryan and the vociferous laughter of a happy child.

The deeper the indentation upon the wax the louder the phonograph re-sponses. The deeper the impressions which are made upon the mind and the heart as a rule the longer mem-ory will hold these records and repeat them when wanted.

You must make the first impression deep or else you can have no vivid re-membrance of a fact or thought. "Why do I forget names?" I asked a friend some time ago. "When I was young, I could remember about every-thing. I knew the history of all the leading men of this country. I never forgot a face. I rarely forget a name. But I must be growing old." You per-ceived my friend's error. We are not grow-ing old in the sense that your brain is growing weaker. It is growing stronger. It is growing full of the time. The reason you do not remember certain people is be-cause you never made any impressions upon your brain or else there can be no memory." My friend was right. If you would remember what are my benefits of God's love you must first clearly and distinctly recognize what they are and then proceed fully and deeply upon your hearts.

Have you had any deep impressions of the divine love? Oh, thou scroll of memory, among thy records is there to be found in the past the deep joy of the consciousness of sins forgiven? Can we find there any traces of mercy-mindfulness, by which we, as re-turning prodigals, were welcomed back to the heart of our Father's home? Among thy records, did we ever read the promises of the Holy Scriptures in the cosmic far off? Oh, the joys, the tenderness and the sympathy of the Divine Lover? Have transcendent joys of the gospel? Have we been filled with wonder upon our Diagoras of Rhodes was so over-wrought with joy because his three sons were all crowned as victors in one day in the Olympic games that when these three sons brought to him their victorious palms he dropped dead into their arms. If joy for an earthly conquest could make such an impression upon Diagoras, how much had not deep impressions made upon our minds and hearts because Christ comes and says, "Arise, I have ex-piated all his sacrifice? If you would remember the benefits of God's mercy you must fully grasp and know what the birth and the death and the resurrection of Christ mean. You can-not grasp the atonement of Christ if you will only kneel as penitent sin-ners at his feet and plead for the divine gift of grace.

But to have first impressions of God's love is not enough. An idiot can get a great impression upon his mind, and yet suffer to-day will do him but little good. For many years there has been going up and down the world a strange genius. He goes by the name of "Blind Tom." He is a full blooded negro, as black as coal. He has a wonderful musical memory. He can play any piece of music. He can play any one of Beeth-oven's sonatas, or Liszt's rhapsodies, or Chopin's ballads, or Hummel's concertos. He can sing any song which a man, who cannot spell his own name, will sit down at the ivory keys and play. He can sing any song which he has heard. Tom's musical memory is wonderful. Thousands unwillingly will for-get what he has done and how he does it. Oh, yes, you say, but Tom has "gospel mnemonics" you must have more than mere mental impressions. You must have the heart impressed with first impressions of God's love with the great atonement of Christ and the ascension of Christ. Then you will remember God's love, because like the links of a golden chain link is held by link to other links.

Then, how you must have a central thought. Just as each constellation of the heavens revolves about some one star, so you must have a fact or truth centre unless you think of the stars that compose that constellation. Each Achish's court, thinking he would be safer with his country's enemies than with Saul. Hardly had God seated him firmly upon the Hebrew throne than David forgot all of God's mercies and care. He signed a death warrant on his country's wars. He made love to Bakhsheba, another man's wife. He then murdered her husband. According to Nathan's parable, he killed the poor man's lamb. such a marvelous memory and such a wonderful mimicry of thought and expression was due to one custom. From the time he was a young man he never read an important book, he never heard an important speech, he never listened to an important con-versation but he always went home, took his pen and paper, and made a careful and succinct abstract of the thoughts he wished to remember. Now, my friends, you and I by "gospel mnemonics" ever be able to hold clearly and distinctly in our minds and hearts the benefits which God has placed about us unless we are able to write them down and also are able by long practice to tell them to some one else?

But, though this fact is true, some people never think of telling their friends what they have done for them. They do not care whether any one else knows their choice blessings or not. If these same people have re-ceived an honorary degree from some college they have their diplomas fram-ed and hung up in their studies, where every visitor can see them. If they belong to some secret order and are high up in the councils they al-ways have the lodge's picture and their badges in conspicuous places to let you know their position. They seem to care little whether you know the benefits they have received from them. But after we have built them we have shut the secret doors which lead to them and to the contents of their very existence. "In the carriage," she said, with an-other little laugh of nervous happiness.

At the foot of the stairs they were surrounded. Men whose faces Loder barely knew crowded about him. The intolerable of entrance was still in the air—the instinct that a new force had made itself felt, a new speech been uttered upon, uttered prophetically in every mind.

Pissing through the enthusiastic con-course of men, he came unexpected by upon Fraide and Lady Sarah sur-rounded by a group of friends. The old statesman came forward instantly and, taking Loder's arm, walked with him to Chiltoite's waiting brougham. He said little as they slowly made their way to the carriage, but the pres-sure of his fingers was tense and an unrecorded color showed in his face. When Eve and Loder had taken their seats, he stepped to the edge of the curb. There were about for the mo-ment, and, leaning close to the car-riage, he put his hand through the open window. In silence he took Eve's fingers and held them in a long, affec-tionate pressure; then he released them and took Loder's hand.

"Good night, Chiltoite," he said. "You have proved yourself worthy of her. Good night." He turned quickly and rejoined his waiting friends. In an other second the horses had wheeled round, and Eve and Loder were car-ried swiftly forward into the darkness.

In the great moments of man's life woman comes before—and after. Some shadow of this truth was in Loder's mind as she lay back in her seat, with closed eyes and parted lips. It seemed that life could have no truer joy for him time—came in the glad, proud, satisfy-ing tide of things accomplished. This was her hour, and the recognition of it brought the blood to her face in a sud-den happy rush. There had been no need to precipitate its coming; it had been ordained from the first.

Whether she desired it or no, whether she strove to draw it nearer or strove to ward it off, its coming had been in-evitable. She opened her eyes sudden-ly and looked out into the darkness, the darkness throbbing with multitudes of lives, all waiting, all desiring fulfil-ment. She was no longer lonely, no longer aloof. She was kin with all this pitiful, admirable, sinning, loving hu-manity. Again tears of pride and hap-piness filled her eyes. Then suddenly the thing she had waited for came to pass.

Loder leaned close to her. She was conscious of his nearer presence, of his strong, masterful personality. With a thrill that caught her breath she felt his arm about her shoulder and heard the words he spoke.

"Eve," he said, "I love you. Do you understand? I love you," and, drawing her close to him, he bent and kissed her.

With Loder, Eve was free to do fully. When he gave, he gave generously; when he swept aside a barrier, he left no stone standing. He had been slow to recognize his opportunity, slower still to recognize his feelings. But now that the knowledge came he received it openly. In his matter of self com-prehended love he gave no thought to either past or future. That they loved and were alone was all he knew or questioned. She was as much Eve—the one woman—as though they were together in the primeval garden and to that spirit he claimed her.

He neither spoke nor behaved ex-travagantly in that great moment of comprehension. He acted quietly, with the completeness of purpose that he gave to everything. He held found a new capacity within himself, and he was strong enough to dread no weak-ness in displaying it.

Holding her close to him, he repeated his declaration again and again, as though repetition ratified it. He found no need to question her for his benefit—he had divined it in a flash of happi-ness as she stood waiting in the door-way of the gallery, but his own sur-render was a different matter.

As the carriage passed round the cor-ner of Whitehall and dipped into the traffic of Piccadilly he bent down again and held her soft face between his hands, and the warm personal contact, the slight, fresh smell of violets so suggestive of her presence, stirred him afresh.

"Eve," he said vehemently, "do you understand? Do you know that I have loved you always—from the very first?" As he said it he bent still nearer, kissing her lips, her forehead, her eyes.

At the same moment the horses slackened speed and then stopped, ar-rested by the temporary blocks that so often occur in the traffic of Pic-cadilly circus.

Loder, preoccupied by his own feel-ings, scarcely noticed the halt, but Eve drew away from him, laughing.

"You mustn't," she said softly. "Look!"

MESSRS. DAFOE AND WALLER EXPLAIN THEIR PROPOSITION TO OUR CITIZENS.

There was a good attendance at the public meeting in the town hall last Friday night, to hear what Messrs. Dafoe and Waller had to say respecting their offer to the town.

Mayor Meng was called on to preside, and in a short address stated the object of the meeting, and called on

Mr. J. R. Dafoe, who outlined the following scheme for reducing the cost of producing electric light by the town plant, and also inducing other manufacturers to locate here. Dafoe and Waller made an estimate, and finally entered into an agreement to fix up the canal, confer it, and get out of the water privilege all there is in it. A lease was drawn up, and they were now in a position to go on with the work—but they could carry it out, whether the town accepted the offer or not; but should the town decide to accept the offer and enter into an agreement, they would at once install a larger plant.

Mr. Dafoe said it could be made a first-class water power. The Rathbun Co. were now running down the river their last drive of logs, and in future there would be no interference with the dams, which held the back water, just at a time when they should not be disturbed. There are seven dams on the river and lakes, and if the water were judiciously conserved there should be plenty of power from the canal for every day in the year. He

An expert, Prof. Kirkpatrick, C.E. of Queen's College, Kingston, had made a report. The present leakage is about one-third of the water used, and would develop 114 horse power, more than enough to supply the town's electric plant. The balance of the power would be used by the establishments at present on the canal, and others who would be induced to locate here owing to cheap power. This is an opportunity Napanee has not wanted long for, and already Mr. Waller and he had proposals from outside parties wishing to locate here.

THEIR PROPOSITION.

Mr. Dafoe briefly outlined the following plan to the meeting, viz.:

The present electric plant of the town to be used by them to light the town in case of accident, to be kept in repair and run by them for the purpose of town lighting only at such times as the water supply was low. They would supply the power from the canal to the power house, and distribute it over the town's lines. This they would agree to do for the sum of $3,000 per annum, just what the Electric Light Co. is charging the town for light. This now costs the town $4,500, besides the salary of an electrician, $600 a year.

They would agree to give a 23-hour service daily, instead of the present 10-hour service. They would also agree to furnish the town with 125 horse power (about 75 horse power is now required), and the town would also increase its revenue to the extent of the power allowed such customers be found for light. This would be the case at once. In many instances our merchants are now required to light with gas during dull days and before the town lights are put on and after they are cut off. The town would stand to save at least $1,500 a year, and had nothing to lose, as if the company failed to carry out its agreement we could at once start up the town plant and work independently of the company.

The town plant would still be under the supervision and control of the town commissioners, who will supply their own electrician and collect the revenue from all private consumers.

Mr. Dafoe stated that the agreement be made for fifteen years, with the privilege of renewing for another fifteen years, should both parties to the agreement be willing. He also stated that should the town run its present plant 23 hours per day, it would in all probability save $7,000 a year. The new company would be able to develop double the power now supplied by the canal, and in a short time double the number of factories would be in operation in our midst.

He wanted the meeting to pass a resolution asking the Town Council to submit a by-law to the rate-payers for their approval, and in the meantime the matter could be thoroughly discussed and the agreement drafted.

Mr. Waller had not much to add to what Mr. Dafoe had stated. If they secured the contract with the town, they would develop so much more power. They were not enemies of those already receiving power from the canal, but would carry out their leases. With but a little blasting of the flat rocks at the palace, they would create a fine reservoir as far up the river as 'Mink's bridge. Experts stated that now there was sufficient water wasted to run another a good water power.

Belleville was in the same position that Napanee now is. They had their own steam electric plant, but were not using it, as they got it cheaper from the Trenton Electric Co., two miles distant. With this plant still our own, and in good condition, if they did not fulfil the agreement, we could use our machinery as in the past year. We were now independent of the Carswright Co., and not as we formerly were under the old agreement, which had proved so unsatisfactory. The new company would not sell light, but only power.

Mr. Dafoe stated that they would be able to supply power at $24 per horse power or less all the year round. There was now 400 horse power developed and 150 going to waste.

Messrs. F. F. Miller, M. S. Madole, Thos. Symington, Harry Taylor, Miss Shirley, Max Fox, Wm. Greer and others, asked a number of questions, which were satisfactorily answered, and Mr. Chas. Walters explained the present working of the town plant, expense, etc.

The following resolution was then put and carried with scarcely a dissenting vote; on motion of Messrs. F. F. Miller and U. M. Wilson:

Resolved that this mass meeting approves of the steps so far progressed by Messrs. Dafoe and Waller to supply electricity for the use of the town plant, and recommend that the Town Council and Electric Light Commissioners arrange a contract as per said scheme with the Power Co. as represented by Messrs. Dafoe and Waller, and that said contract be subject to ratification by vote of the electors.

PARISH OF CAMDEN.

The Parish Church of St. Luke at Camden East will (D.V.) be consecrated on Sunday, June 16th, at 10.30 a.m., by the Right Reverend William Lennox Mills, D.D., Bishop of the Diocese of, Ontario, assisted by Rural Dean Dibb, and other Clergymen in the Diocese. The Rev. F. D. Woodcock, rector of Trinity church, Brockville, will preach the sermon.

The first church of St. Luke in the Village of Camden East, in the County of Lennox and Addington, was built and consecrated for service on March 4th, A.D. 1844.

Corner stone of present church was laid A.D. 1898, by the Honorable Clark Wallace, the Rev. F. D. Woodcock being rector.

Service, Sunday, June 16th, at 3 p.m., when the Bishop will preach, at 7.30 p.m. at Yarker, where the Bishop will hold a Confirmation service. Mr. Babcroft McWilliams will kindly drive the Bishop to Newburgh at 3 p.m., and to Yarker for the 7.30 p.m. Confirmation service.

DAFOE AND WALLER'S OFFER.

The above gentlemen offer to furnish 125 electrical horse power at the present power house owned by the town for lighting purposes, the current to be on twenty-three hours per day, twenty-four, only in case of accident; and to be used at night or low water they to have the use of the present steam electrical plant to develop sufficient power to light the town and the town's customers, and the steam electric plant not to be used to supply their power customers. The steam plant to be at all times under the control of the town commissioners, but all expenses of operating the plant to be paid by Dafoe and Waller to be paid by them also and for a fifteen-year contract, and at the end of five years the town receives a bona fide offer of cheaper power, and they cannot meet the price offered, their contract to become null and void, and at any time during their term of contract they fail to furnish the power used up to 125 electrical horse power, and at Christmas time the town have the electrical horse power they require for electrical displays in the stores, and in case of the above conditions not being carried out this contract becomes null and void.

Our town is burdened with a constantly increasing debt, and here is a chance to reduce it considerably. We feel sure our town council will grasp the opportunity and set out at once to draft an agreement with Messrs. Dafoe and Waller, and submit a by-law to the ratepayers. It necessary, let another public meeting be called if our town councillors do not feel that the unanimous voice of the people is at their backs. The agreement should be carefully drawn up, and the interests of the town safeguarded.

KEEPING ABREAST OF THE TIMES.

The pages of The Beaver are especially interesting this week. A report of the mass meeting held in town hall, re electric power, is on page 1, and is well worth reading. On page 2 will be found a great deal of local matter, personal, an "Address to a Swallow," which contains an installment of our interesting serial, "The Heiress," as well as a report of the proceedings of the County Council now in session. Personals, local matter and ads. of our merchants, found on pages 4 and 5, are well worth a look for perusal and the bargains found in the ads. are equal (if not better) to any offering in our county neighbors. The proceedings of the Town Council, local matter, and an interesting column of general news. Page 8 is entirely local, both reading matter and ads., and page 7 is one of the best issues that The Beaver has printed in a long time. Every page, from 1 to 10, will interest our readers, and you have not read all the news until you perused each one.

NEWBURGH.

On Friday afternoon last the High School baseball team defeated the local senior team by a score of 8-7. The game was closely contested throughout, and both teams played good ball. W. B. Dunn pitched a good game for the seniors, and got good support. George Shorey, the Southpaw, pitched for the students, and barring the fifth innings had the seniors at his mercy, throughout the game. In the fifth innings he weakened, and the seniors got 5 runs. Then the youngster settled down and not another run could the seniors get. He was quite steady with men on bases, particularly so in the 3d, when with the bases full and no men out, he fanned the next three batsmen. In all 18 of the seniors fanned the air in vain efforts to locate the Southpaw's shoots. Dunn had a good many strike outs to his credit. When the students went in for their last innings, the score stood 7-3 against them, but they started the fireworks right off and sent 5 runs across the plate with two men out, enough to win the game. Shorts, the senior's first baseman, smashed the horseshide to left field for the first home run of the season. J. M. Denyes umpired the game.

An interesting game of lawn tennis was played on the local courts on Saturday, between Enterprise and Newburgh. In the doubles, Lace and Allen, Enterprise, won from Dunn and Ryan, but in the singles, Dunn beat Lace, and Ryan defeated Allen.

If the management of the baseball team wish to strengthen the game in the village they will eliminate the kicking part of the business. Nothing is so disgusting to the spectators as the continual kicking, and the sooner the kickers quit it the better it will be for the game.

The Largest Jack Manufacturer in the World Writes about

Zutoo

Regarding your Zutoo Tablets I beg to say: I have been a sufferer from headache since childhood and have used all or nearly all, of the so-called "cures" on the market, till warned by my physician to discontinue their use on account of their bad effects on the heart. Some months since my attention was called to your Zutoo Tablets and I have been using them ever since with the most gratifying results. I find they cure a "sick" or "nervous" headache in a few minutes and leave no bad effects. My family use them whenever needed with equally good results. I have frequently given them to friends who were suffering from headache and they never fail to give quick relief. I find them a good remedy for "sour" stomach as well as headache. I always carry them in my grip on the road and would not be without them at any cost.

ADDRESS TO A SWALLOW.

For The Beaver.

And you have returned and I have caught
Her in this chamber, seeking some nook
Or cranny where you can nest.
I will not harm thee, but thy freedom give,
If thou will tell me where your wanderings
When Botera' mantle o'erspread our Where nature slept so cold and placid, but now with spring time is awake.
Where you have fled, with spring time to the buds to start, and coaxes Nature to assume her verdant dress, you quickly return to build and breed again in this thy native land.
Then tell me if in thy travels thou hast seen a place that to thine eye did seem more beauteous fair than this?
Doth other climes produce more favored skies, more lovely forests, more laughing waters, or pleasing vista of hill and field and lake, that cannot call on without a sigh to leave?
Some city does boast of more splendor to appear in some vast cave, where you will entomb the vernal sunshine.
But, that is false.
For thou, we know, doth love the blue Cerulean, and like best to cleave the ether far above the earth, to care to pass so long a slumber in some dark and loathsome cavern.
And you have returned to the old home-stead, to the very gable where you were born.
But, that is true, is there not in lands more genial, and where the sunshine is more radiant with sculptured arch and carven pillar where you could nest.
Why not in Cuba's palm thatched eve, in adobe walls, in Metera Sonalli, in some old Aztec fane, in forest where reigns perpetual summer?
Any why return to these grey walls in thy native place?
And tell me what you did depart over the broad and trackless sea?
If some veteran seamew scout patrolled of the Atlantic, and if you met the Flying Dutchman in his ghostly ship of fear?
And who did show the airy course?
Or are there secrets in the ocean depths that birds alone can see?
Or are thy mindward earthly things, hill and dale and river, and the busy cities of men?
And had you a choice of country, or did you aimlessly wander until the pilgrim age?
And who to Napanee did lead thee and tell thee of the good town?
Or did you get such knowledge from the sun's ever glowing orb?
Or was it its genial rays causing thy favored food to break from its winty lethargy?
Springing to life up heartwards that brought thee back again?
Thy kindred are many? the speedy swift, the twittering mason builder, he of the barns, the marshia of the house and the sand?
The swift loves best some sooty flue where he can glare her nest.
The mason likes the country where, under a bridge or some abandoned shanty he suspended.
He of the barn seems shaded timber.
The martin of the sand will choose for his tunnel seat where delights.
While the martin of the house and thou prefer the urban do not like.
Then tell me if such choice ye make when or did ye, as passing wayfarers, use any shelter of the past?
And tell me if you like not to fit said dilapidated cage for the quiet's snarling water, or some abandoned mill where lies
O'er broad savannah or emerald meadow;
Or some far distant prairie land, where the queen of lilies floats with all her regal beauty bathed in tropic light?
Or where the Napanee's tide ebbs and flows,
Or where the Moira's waters unite rivers?
O'er northern marsh where the blackbird sings?
Or southern lagoon where, whilst slimy eels writhe and coil, all the struggles of the night?
Do you like to skim along our northern lakes, or where the sea-gull sweeps softly
Or tropic woods, where the mocking-bird and the tropic magpie, and the orchid darts with jewelled wings, sipping honey from wondrous flowers?
Or our Canadian forests, where on sunny days the Arcadian Fly, and many a shiny midst dewy silver and modest flowers.
Tell me this, and tell me quickly, for I must set thee free again.

THE MASQUERADER

By Katherine Cecil Thurston, author of "The Circles," etc.

The carriage had stopped beside one of the small islands that interest the place. A group of pedestrians were crowded upon it, under the light of the electric lamp—wayfarers who, like themselves, were awaiting a passage. Loder took a cursory glance at them, then turned back to Eve.

"What are they, after all, but men and women?" he said. "They'd understand—every one of them." He laughed in his turn. Nevertheless he withdrew his arm. Her feminine thought for conventionalities appealed to him. It was an acknowledgment of dependency.

For awhile they sat silent, the light of the street lamp flickering through the glass of the window, the hum of voices and traffic coming to them in a continuous rise and fall of sound. At first the position was interesting, but as the seconds followed each other it became irksome. Loder, watching the varying expressions of Eve's face, grew impatient of the delay, grew suddenly eager to be alone again in the fragrant darkness.

Impelled by the desire, he leaned forward and opened the window.

"Let's find the meaning of this," he said. "Is there nobody to regulate the traffic?" As he spoke he thrust his face and leaned out of the window. There was a touch of imperious annoyance in his manner. Fresh from the realization of power, there was something irksome in this commonplace check to his desires.

"Isn't it possible to get out of this?" Eve heard him call to the coachman. Then she heard no more.

He had leaned out of the carriage with the intention of looking onward toward the cause of the delay. Instead, by that magnetic attraction that undoubtedly exists, he looked directly in front of him at the people waiting on the little island—at one man who leaned against the lamp post in the attitude of careless fatigue, with a pallid, unshaven face and lusterless eyes, who wore a cap drawn low over his forehead.

He looked at this man, and the man saw and returned his glance. For a space of ten seconds indescribable they held each other's eyes; then very slowly Loder drew back into the carriage.

He let he dropped into his seat Eve glanced at him anxiously.

"John," she said, "has anything happened? You look ill."

He turned to her and tried to smile. "It's nothing," he said. "Nothing to worry about." He spoke quickly, but his voice had suddenly become flat. All the command, all the domination, had dropped away from it.

Eve bent close to him, her face lighting up with anxious tenderness. "It was the excitement," she said, "the strain of tonight."

He looked at her, but he made no attempt to press the fingers that clasped his own.

"Yes," he said slowly. "Yes. It was the excitement of tonight—and the reaction."

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE next morning at 8 o'clock, and again without breakfast, Loder covered the distance between Grosvenor square and Clifford's inn. He left Chilcote's house hastily—with a haste that only an urgent motive could have driven him to adopt. His steps were quick and unerring as he traversed the intervening streets; his shoulders lacked their decisive poise, and his pale face was marked with shadows beneath the eyes—shadows that bore witness to the sleepless night spent in pacing Chilcote's vast and lonely room. By the curious effect of circumstances the likeness between the two men had never been more significantly marked than on that morning of April 19, when Loder walked along the pavements crowded with early workers and brisk with insistent news venders already alive to the value of last night's political crisis.

The irony of this last element in the day's concerns came to him fully when one newsboy, more energetic than his fellows, thrust a paper in front of him. "Sensation in the house, sir! Speech by Mr. Chilcote! Government defeat!"

For a moment Loder stopped and his face reddened. The tide of emotion still ran strong. His hand went instinctively to his pocket; then his lips set. He shook his head and walked on.

With the same hard expression about his mouth, he turned into Clifford's inn, passed through his own doorway and mounted the stairs.

This time there was no milk can on the threshold of his room and the door yielded to his pressure without the need of a key. With a strange sensation of reluctance he walked into the narrow passage and paused, uncertain which room to enter first. As he stood hesitating a sound from the sitting room settled the question.

"Who's there?" it called irritably. "What do you want?"

Without further ceremony the intruder pushed the door open and entered. His face was to the light, and about his shoulders was an old plaid shawl. Behind him on the table stood a cup, a teapot and the can of milk; farther off a kettle was set to boil upon a tiny spirit stove.

In all strong situations we are more or less commonplace. Loder's first remark as he glanced round the disordered room seemed strangely inefficient.

"Where's Robins?" he asked in a brusque voice. His mind teemed with big considerations, yet this was his first involuntary question.

Chilcote had started at the entrance of his visitor; now he sat staring at him, his hands holding the arms of his chair.

"Where's Robins?" Loder asked again.

"I don't know. She— I— We did not hit it off. She's gone—went yesterday." He shivered and drew the rug about him.

"Chilcote"— Loder began sternly. Then he paused. There was something in the other's look and attitude that arrested him. A change of expression passed over his own face. He turned about, with an abrupt, sharp gesture put off his coat and threw it on a chair; then, crossing deliberately to the fireplace, he began to rake the ashes from the grate.

Within a few minutes he had a fire crackling where the bed of dead cinders had been, and, having finished the task, he rose slowly from his knees, wiped his hands and crossed to the table. On the small spirit stove the kettle had boiled, and the cover was lifting and falling with a tinkling sound. Bring out the flame, Loder picked up the teapot and his hand and arm were evidently accustomed to the task, about making the tea.

During the whole operation he never spoke, though all the while he was fully conscious of Chilcote's puzzled gaze. The tea ready, he poured it into the cup and carried it across the room.

"Drink this!" he said laconically. "The fire will be up presently."

Chilcote extended a cold and shaky hand. "You are"— he began.

But Loder checked him almost savagely. "I do—as well as though I had followed you from Piccadilly last night. You've been hanging about, God knows where, till the small hours of the morning; then you've come back—shunk back, starving for your infernal poison and shivering with cold. You've settled the first part of the business, but the cold has still to be reckoned with. Drink the tea. I've something to say to you." He mastered his vehemence and, walking to the window, stood looking down into the court. His eyes were blank, his face hard; his ears heard nothing but the faint sound of Chilcote's swallowing, the click of the cup against his teeth.

For a time that seemed interminable he stood motionless; then, when he judged the tea finished, he turned slowly. Chilcote had drawn closer to the fire. He was obviously braced by the warmth, and the apathy that had clung about him was to some extent dispelled. Still moving slowly, Loder went forward and, relieving him of the empty cup, stood looking down at him.

"Chilcote," he said very quietly, "I've come to tell you that the thing must end."

After he spoke there was a prolonged pause; but as if all shaken with sudden consciousness, Chilcote now. The rug dropped from one shoulder and hung down ludicrously; his hand caught the back of the chair for support; his unshaven face looked absurd and repulsive in the sudden expression of seared inquiry. Loder involuntarily turned away.

"I mean it," he said slowly. "It's over; we've come to the end."

"But why?" Chilcote articulated blankly. "Why? Why?" In his confusion he could think of no better word.

"Because I throw it up. My side of the bargain's off."

Again Chilcote's lips parted stammeringly. The apathy caused by physical exhaustion and his recently administered drug was passing from him; the hopelessly shattered condition of mind and body was showing through it like a skeleton through a thin covering of flesh.

"But why?" he said again. "Why?"

Still Loder avoided the frightened surprise of his eyes. "Because I withdraw," he answered doggedly.

Then suddenly Chilcote's tongue was loosened. "Loder," he cried excitedly, "you can't do it! Great heavens, man, you can't do it!" To reassure himself he laughed—a painfully thin echo of his old sarcastic laugh. "It's a matter of greater opportunity," he began, "of more money"—

But Loder turned upon him.

"Be quiet!" he said so menacingly that the other stopped. Then by an effort he compressed himself. "It's not a matter of money, Chilcote," he said quietly. "It's a matter of necessity." He brought the word out with difficulty.

Chilcote glanced up. "Necessity?" he repeated. "How? Why?"

The reiteration roused Loder. "Because there was a great scene in the House last night," he began hurriedly. "Because when you go back you'll find that Sefborough has smashed up over the Government majority in this British Reciefield at Mosbed and that you have made your mark in a big speech, and because"— Abruptly he stopped. The thing he had come to say—the thing he had meant to say—would not be said. Either his tongue or his resolution failed him, and for the instant he stood as silent and almost as ill at ease as his companion. Then all at once the spiration came to him, in the suggestion of a wellnigh forgotten argument by which he might influence Chilcote and save his own self respect. "It's all over, Chilcote," he said more quietly. "Tethra run itself out." And in a few sentences he sketched the story of Lillian Astrupp, her past relations with himself, her present suspicions. It was not what he had meant to say; it was not what he had come to say, but it served the purpose—it saved him humiliation.

Chilcote listened—to the last word. Then, as the other finished, he dropped nervously back into his chair. "Good heavens, man," he said, "why didn't you tell me? Why didn't you warn me instead of filling my mind with your political position? Your political position!" He laughed unsteadily. The long spells of indulgence that had weakened his already matured faculties showed in the laugh, in the sudden breaking of his voice. "You must do something, Loder!" he added nervously, checking his amusement. "You must do something!"

Loder looked down at him. "No," he said decisively. "It's your turn now. It's you who've got to do something."

Chilcote's face turned a shade greyer. "I can't," he said below his breath.

"Can't? Oh, yes, you can. We can all do—anything. It's not too late; there's just sufficient time. Chilcote," he added suddenly, "don't you see that the thing has been madness all along—has been like playing with the most infernal explosives? You may thank whatever you have faith in that no-

Beware of Ointments for Catarrh that Contain Mercury, as mercury will surely destroy the sense of smell and completely derange the whole system when entering it through the mucous surfaces. Such articles should never be used except on prescriptions from reputable physicians, as the damage they will do is ten fold to the good you can possibly derive from them. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, O., contains no mercury, and is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. In buying Hall's Catarrh Cure be sure you get the genuine. It is taken internally, and made in Toledo, Ohio, by F. J. Cheney & Co. Testimonials free.

Address IND. R. SAYERS, Prin., 23d Picton Business College.

The New Cash Grocery.

Some people mistook our regular prices for cut prices. Our prices are the natural result of our syndicate buying and doing a strictly cash business.

We never were an ordinary retail store. Our retail department was started several years ago by a strictly wholesale house in Toronto, and as such we have always had special privileges of getting some lines direct from manufacturers, and giving our customers the wholesaler's profit and while our Picton store does a general wholesale trade with other stores in the town and county, about 95 per cent. of our Napanee stock was shipped direct to Napanee by the manufacturers.

We have no pyramid of goods that have been decorating the store till age has made them almost unfit for use.

No three or four years' old canned goods, or any price. Ours are all 1906 goods. We have a full line of staple and fancy groceries, fresh, direct from the manufacturers.

And no combination of grocerymen in Napanee can affect our buying, or force us into combine to raise prices as some of them openly threaten through their direct representative.

We are not saying that other stores could not sell such lines as coal oil at same prices as we do if they sold for cash only; but we ask you to compare our prices with Napanee prices before we opened here.

There are advances, but no drops in the wholesale market. All changes in prices are purely local. Our goods are the freshest and best. Our prices always right.

JUNE CANADIAN MAGAZINE.

The Canadian Magazine for June contains an excellent variety of contributions, the ones of most interest being an article by Prof. R. E. Macnaughton, entitled "A Plea for Woman Suffrage in Canada;" "Reminiscences of Lady Tilley and Mitchell," by J. E. B. McCready; "Canada's New 'Cavern World,'" by Frank Yeigh; and "Notes on the Seasons," by John E. Webber. The fiction and verse are of a high order. A short story entitled "Over the Telephone to Charlie," is exceptionally entertaining, and at the same time deals with a great problem—the distribution of wealth. Altogether the number contains eleven articles and four short stories, besides the usual departments.

A WONDERFUL PIANIST.

(Watertown, N.Y., Daily Standard.)

The managers of the Star electric theatre on Court street have arranged with Professor W. O. Stevens, of London, Ont., to appear at the theatre during the three summer months, in his specialties on the piano. As a musician Prof. Stevens has no superiors, and upon his first appearance at the Star he fairly electrified his listeners, being appreciated the most of course by those who are fond of and have a true conception of music and its charms.

He is claimed by those who know to be the finest pianist that has ever been heard in this city, and does a number of stunts which stamp him as being about the "best ever." The local management considers itself very fortunate in securing the services of this man at the present time, and there is no doubt about his staying here a great attraction during his stay here.

Professor Stevens does such little turns as playing four tunes on the piano at the same time, playing with his back turned toward the instrument, a feat which requires a wonderful knowledge of music and the greatest dexterity as it requires a complete change in fingering. He plays some tunes in a dozen different keys and does other similar difficult and wonderful turns.

He is playing undoubtedly the finest yet heard in Watertown and furnishes a specialty at the Star which will not fail to attract all lovers of music.

EXPRESSION OF APPRECIATION.

The pastor of the Bay Circuit, Rev J. Wesley Down, having received and accepted a call to Grace church, Napanee, a special meeting of the Official Board was held on Monday, for the purpose of securing a supply for the remainder of the year, after disposing of this matter, the following resolution was unanimously adopted by a standing vote:

"Moved by F. S. Wilson, and seconded by J. M. Joyce, that we, the members of the Bay Circuit, in session assembled, hereby express our high appreciation of the faithful and efficient services rendered by our retiring pastor, Rev. J. W. Down, during his three years' term upon this circuit. We also wish to say that during his pastorate he has been unsparing in his care of the aged, sick and needy; as a preacher, his sermons have been of the highest order, giving evidence of careful study and thorough preparation; as Chairman of the Board he has been prudent and impartial, while as a revivalist, he had done extensive and lasting work. In fact, we are free to affirm, that he has succeeded in giving almost universal satisfaction in all departments of the church, and has proved himself to be a true friend of God, and worthy of confidence and support. And while we are sorry that he could not see his way clear to accept the many famous invitation to remain with us for a fourth year, we feel it our duty to release him, that he may secure for another educational advantages for another pastoral term, and in doing so we all join in wishing him and his model family God speed in their new field of labor."

Signed in behalf of the Official Board and Circuit, by

J. M. JOYCE,
Recording Steward.

WOMEN PAY MORE.

WHY INSURANCE COMPANIES DISCRIMINATE AGAINST THE GENTLE SEX.

If one is to believe the medical examiners the reason a woman pays more for the privilege of life insurance is that she is much more commonly a victim of indigestion and stomach troubles and the fatal ailments that spring from these causes. It is not the acute attacks of disease that influence the insurance examiners alone, but the constant feeling of weakness, headache, indigestion and stomach trouble. These things, physicians say, kill more people than many of the serious diseases.

For curative power in all stomach troubles nothing else is as safe or effective, nothing else can be so thoroughly relied upon to relieve all troubles of indigestion, as Mi-o-na. It is not a mere digestive tablet; it strengthens and restores to natural action the stomach and bowels and makes a complete cure in even the worst form of stomach troubles. T. B. Wallace sells Mi-o-na in 50-cent boxes under a guarantee to refund the money unless it does all that is claimed for it.

JUNE BRIDES.

Two popular young ladies of our town were married on Wednesday, and left for their new homes, carrying with them the good wishes of a host of admirers and friends.

HARDY—TERSBULL.

At 7.30 a.m., in the Presbyterian church, Miss Edith Hardy, youngest daughter of J. C. Hardy, John street, became the bride of William H. Turnbull, of Toronto. The ceremony was performed by Rev. J. B. Coon, M.A. The church was beautifully decorated with palms, potted plants and asters by the bride's girl friends. The ceremony was performed under arch of vines and daisies. The bride was daintily attired in embroidered lace, over cream duchess satin, and wore the customary veil, and orange blossoms. She carried a shower bouquet of lilies of the valley. She was attended by Miss Helen Huntsman, of Toronto, who wore pink liberty and carried pink roses. Mr. Garnet Hardy, brother of the bride, supported the groom. The ushers were, Mr. Corbett and Mr. F. McGeorgal, of Toronto. The bride received many handsome presents, consisting of cut glass, silver, china-ware, and other beautiful articles. The groom's favor to the bride was a handsome ruby and diamond ring, to the bridesmaid, a box of pearls, and pearl pins to the ushers. During the signing of the register Mr. O. Fair sang "O Promise Me" (Reginald De Koven), and Lohengrin's bridal song as the bride entered the church. Miss Edna Fraser played the wedding march, and also the organ softly throughout the service. After the ceremony a reception was held at the residence of the bride's parents, John street, and a dainty wedding breakfast served. The bride's going away gown was of navy blue, with white lace blouse and hemming line and hat to match. Mr. and Mrs. Turnbull are supposed to leave on the 1.38 train for a honeymoon trip east, but on the appointed the bridal party and a host of friends by driving to the railway station and then to the eastern portion of the town, where a motor car was in waiting, and were taken to Kingston to catch the evening steamer to Toronto. The large collection of rice and confetti was showered on them, will have to be reserved for some future bride.

MING—BATES.

Another wedding event was interesting as the former was performed at 1.30 p.m., when Miss Florence Ming, only daughter of Dr. E. Ming, John street, was united in marriage to Aaron T. Bates, of Chicago. The ceremony was performed by Rev. W. S. Baker, of Conidaratsta. The bride was attended by her cousin, Miss Lottie Gilpin, of Napanee, and the groom by Mr. Clarke, performed the

CHAPTER XXVII.

BUT Loder did not leave London, and the hour of 2 on the day after found him again in his sitting room.

He sat at the center table surrounded by a cloud of smoke; a pipe was between his lips and the morning's newspapers in a heap beside his elbow. To the student of humanity his attitude was intensely interesting. It was the attitude of a man tormented by the knowledge of his strength. Before him as he sat smoking stretched a gulf of absolute nothingness, and toward this blank future one portion of his consciousness—a strengthless and as yet scarcely distinct portion—pushed him inevitably; while another—a vigorous, persistent, human portion, refused to let him be powerless; and, so clamorous, was this silent mental conflict that had raged incessantly since the moment of his foundation that at last in physical response to it he pushed back his chair.

"It's too late," he said aloud. "I'm a fool. It's too late."

Then abruptly, astonishingly, as though in direct response to his spoken thought, the door opened and Chilcote walked into the room.

Slowly Loder rose and stared at him. The feeling he acknowledged to himself was anger, but below the anger a different emotion ran riotously strong. And it was in time to this second feeling, this sudden, lawless joy, that his pulses beat as he turned a cold face on the intruder.

"Well?" he said sternly.

Mr. Chilcote was nervous to a terrible degree. He was mentally shaken and distressed, though outwardly irreproachable, was to the full as much a victim of the agent—the violets that for a week past had been brought each morning to the door of Loder's sitting room.

For one second, as Loder's eyes rested on the flowers, a sting of ungovernable jealousy shot through him; then as suddenly it died away, superseded by another feeling—a feeling of utter spontaneous pity. Those flowers, sent by himself, the flowers were a symbol!

"Well?" he said again in a gentler voice.

Chilcote had walked to the table and laid down his hat. His face was white and the sockets of his lips twitched around. . . . he drew off his gloves.

"Thank heaven, you're here!" he said hurriedly. "Give me something to drink."

In silence Loder brought out the whisky and set it on the table; then he deliberately he turned, poured out a dose—a liberal one—and swallowed it at a gulp. Instantly he turned, poised himself, and the vicious movement of his fingers to his waistcoat pocket, the hasty dropping of the tabloids into the glass, for an instant the sense of his exact ascendance came to him sharply; the next, he flung it from him. The hurried, inane voice was whispering its dull watchword. The strong man has no time to waste over his weaker brother!

When he heard Chilcote lay down his tumbler he looked back again. "Well, what is it?" he said. "What have you come for?" He strove resolutely to keep his voice severe but, try as he might, he could not quite subdue the nervous force that lay behind his words. Once again, as on the night of their last interview, life had become a mystic, rising to fresh existence even while he sifted its ashes. "Well?" he said once again.

Chilcote hung his head. His hands were nervously passing his handkerchief between his fingers. There was something in the gesture that attracted Loder. Looking at him more attentively, he saw that his own terrible and the man's conventional dress had blinded him to—the almost piteous panic and distress in his visitor's eyes.

"Something's gone wrong!" he said, with abrupt intuition.

Chilcote started. "Yes—no—that is, I—" he stammered.

Loder moved around the table. "Something's gone wrong," he repeated, "and you've come to tell me."

The tone unnerved Chilcote. He suddenly dropped into a chair. "I—it wasn't my fault!" he began. "I—I have had a horrible time."

Loder's lips tightened. "Yes," he said, "yes, I understand."

The other glanced up with a gleam of his old suspicion. "Twas all my nerves, Loder—"

"Of course. Yes, of course." Loder's interruption was curt.

Chilcote eyed him doubtfully. Then recollection took the place of doubt, and a change passed over his expression. "It wasn't my fault," he began lastly. "On my soul, it wasn't! It was Crapham's beastly fault for showing her into the morning room—"

Loder kept silent. His curiosity had flared into sudden life at the other's words, but he feared to break the shattered train of thought even by a word.

In the silence Chilcote moved uneasily. "You see," he went on at last, "when I was here with you I—I felt strong. I—"

"Yes, yes. When you were here with me you felt strong."

"Yes, that's it. While I was here I felt I could do the thing. But when I went home—when I went up to my rooms"— Again he paused, passing his handkerchief across his forehead.

"When you went up to your rooms?" Loder strove hard to keep his control.

"To my room?— Oh, I—I forget about that, I forget about the night"— He hesitated confusedly. "All I remember is the coming down to breakfast next morning—this morning—at 12 o'clock."

Loder turned to the table and poured himself out some whisky. "Yes," he acquiesced in a very quiet voice.

At the word Chilcote rose from his seat. His disquietude was very evident. Once, there was breakfast on the table when I came downstairs—breakfast, with flowers and a horrible, dazzling glare of sun. It was then, Loder, I stood and looked into the room, that the impossibility of it all came to me—that I knew I couldn't stand it—couldn't go on."

Loder swallowed his whisky slowly. His sense of overpowering curiosity held him very still, but he made no effort to prompt his companion.

Again Chilcote shifted his position agitatedly. "I had to be done," he said disjointedly. "I had to do it—then and there. The things were on the bureau—the pens and ink and telegraph forms. They tempted me."

Loder laid down his glass suddenly. An exclamation rose to his lips, but he checked it.

At the slight sound of the tumbler touching the table Chilcote turned, but there was no expression on the other's face to afford him aid.

"They tempted me," he repeated hastily. "They seemed like magnets; they seemed to draw me toward them. I sat at the bureau staring at them for a long time. Then a terrible compulsion seized me—something one could never understand—and I caught up the nearest pen and wrote just what was in my mind. It wasn't a telegram, properly speaking. It was more a letter. I wanted you back, and I had to make myself plain. The writing of the message seemed to steady me; the mere forming of the words quieted my mind. I was almost cool when I got up from the bureau and pressed the bell"—

"The bell?"

"Yes. I rang for a servant. I had to send the wire myself, so I had to get a cab." His voice rose to irritability. He pressed the bell several times, but the thing had gone wrong; I wouldn't work. At last I gave it up and went into the corridor to call some one."

"Well?" In the intense suspense of the moment he never stirred Loder.

"Yes. I rang for a servant. I had to send the wire myself, so I had to get a cab." His voice rose to irritability. He pressed the bell several times, but the thing had gone wrong; I wouldn't work. At last I gave it up and went into the corridor to call some one."

"Well?" In the intense suspense of the moment he never stirred Loder.

"Oh, I went out of the room, but there at the door, before I could call anything, I ran full tilt against that idiot Greening. He was looking for me —for you, rather—about some beastly work either. I was furious to explain that I wasn't in a state for business. I tried to shake him off, but he was worse than ever, and at last, to be rid of the fellow, I went with him to the study"—

"About the telegram?" Loder began. Then again he checked himself. "Yes—yes—I understand," he added quietly.

"I can't tell you how I hated it when I found myself in the study more than ever you wouldn't jar me with sudden questions. I wasn't in the study more than a minute more than five or six minutes"— His voice became confused, the strain of the connected recital was telling upon him. With nervous haste he made a rush for the end of his story. "I wasn't more than seven or eight

"Loder, what are you going to do?"

minutes in the study; then, as I came downstairs Crapham met me in the hall. He told me that Lillian Astrupp had called and wished to see me and that he had shown her into the morning room!"

"The morning room?" Loder suddenly stepped back from the table. "Mrs. Astrupp came to see me, and telegram lying on the bureau?"

His sudden speech and movement startled Chilcote. He, too, blinked his head, then died out, leaving it ashen. "Don't do that, Loder!" he cried. "I—I can't bear it."

With an immense effort Loder controlled himself. "Sorry," he said. "Go on."

"I'm going on. I tell you I'm going on! I got a horrid shock when Crapham told me, but I'm not the man to let it unnerve my mind. I knew Lillian had come to see you. I knew there was going to be a scene."

"But the telegram! The telegram!"

Chilcote paid no heed to the interruption. He was following his own train of ideas. "I knew she had come to see you. I knew there was going to be a scene. When I got to the morning room my head was shaking so that I could scarcely turn the handle; then, as the door opened, I could have cried out with relief. Eve was there as well!"

"Eve!"

"Yes. I don't think I was ever so glad to see her in my life." He laughed hysterically. "I was quite civil to her, and she was—quite sweet to me"— Again he laughed.

Loder's lips tightened.

"You see, it saved the situation. Even if Lillian wanted to be nasty, she couldn't while Eve was there. We talked for about ten minutes. We were quite an amiable trio. Then Lillian told me why she'd called. She wanted me to take a fourth in a theater party at the Arcadian tonight, and I—I was so pleased and so relieved that I—I accepted." He paused and laughed again unsteadily.

In his tense anxiety Loder ground his keel into the floor. "Go on!" he said fiercely. "Go on!"

"Don't!" Chilcote exclaimed. "I'm going on—I'm going on." He passed his handkerchief across his lips. "We talked for ten minutes or so, and then Lillian left. I went with her to the hall door, but Crapham was there too —so I was still safe. She laughed and chatted and seemed in high spirits as we crossed the hall, and she was still smiling as she waved to me from her motor. But then, Loder—then, as I stood in the hall, it all came to me suddenly. I remembered that Lillian must have been alone in the morning room before Eve found her: I remembered the telegram! I ran back to the room, meaning to question Eve as to how long Lillian had been alone, but she had left the room. I ran to the bureau—but the telegram wasn't there!"

"Gone?"

"Yes, gone. That's why I've come straight here."

For a moment they confronted each other. Then, moved by a sudden impulse, Loder pushed Chilcote aside and crossed the room. An instant later he opening and shutting of doors, the hasty pulling out of drawers and tossing of loose cases from the bedroom.

Chilcote, shaken and nervous, stood for a minute where his companion had left him. At last, impelled by curiosity, he too crossed the narrow passage and entered the room.

The full light streamed in through the open window; the keen spring air blew freshly across the landscape, and on the window sill a band of grimy, joyous sparrows twittered and preened themselves. In the middle of the room stood Loder. His coat was off, and round him on chairs and floor lay an array of waistcoats, gloves and ties.

For a space Chilcote stood in the doorway staring at him, then his lips parted and he took a step forward. "Loder," he said anxiously, "Loder, what are you going to do?"

Loder turned. His shoulders were stiff, his face alight with energy. "I'm going back," he said, "to unravel the tangle you have made."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

LODER'S plan of action was already formed when he reached Trafalgar square. The facts of the case were simple. Chilcote had left Lillian Astrupp alone in the morning room at Grosvenor square. By an unlucky chance Lillian Astrupp had been shown up into that room, where she had remained alone until the moment that Eve, called to her by the accident, had found her there. The facts resolved themselves into one question: What use had Lillian made of those solitary moments? Without deviation, Loder's mind turned toward one answer. Lillian was not the woman to lose an opportunity, whether the space at her command was long or short.

So convinced was he that, reaching Trafalgar square, he stopped and hailed a hansom.

"Cadogan gardens!" he called. "No. 32."

The moments seemed very few before the cab drew up beside the door and he caught his second glimpse of the enameled door with its silver fittings. Instantly he pressed the bell—the door was opened by Lillian's discreet, deferential manservant.

"Is Lady Astrupp at home?" he asked.

The man looked thoughtful. "Her ladyship touched at home, sir"—he began cautiously.

But Loder interrupted him. "Ask her to see me," he said peremptorily.

The servant expressed no surprise. His only comment was to throw the door wide.

"If you'll wait in the white room, sir," he said, "I'll inform her ladyship." Chilcote was evidently a frequent and favored visitor.

In this manner Loder for the second time entered the house unfamiliar, and yet so familiar in all that it suggested. Entering the drawing room, he had leisure to look keenly about him. A beautiful room, large and lofty. Luxury was evident on every hand, but it was not the luxury that flaunts its goods. Each object was graceful and possessed its own intrinsic value. The atmosphere was too effeminate to appeal to him, but he acknowledged the taste and artistic delicacy it conveyed. Almost at the moment of acknowledgment the door opened to admit Lillian.

"I thought it would be you," she said enigmatically.

Loder came forward. "You expected me?" he said guardedly. A sudden conviction filled him that there was the evidence of her eyes, but something at once subtler and more definite that prompted her recognition of him.

She smiled. "I thought I expect you? On the contrary, I'm waiting to know why you're here?"

Loder was silent for an instant. Then he answered in her own light tone. "As far as that goes," he said, "let's make it my duty to call and have tea with you. I'm an old fashioned person."

For a full second she surveyed him amusedly. Then at last she spoke. "My dear Jack"—she laid particular stress on the word—"I never laughed at you punctilious. I should have thought bohemian would have been more the word."

Loder felt disconcerted and annoyed. Either, like himself, she was fishing for information or she was deliberately playing with him. In his perplexity he glanced across the room toward the fireplace.

Lillian saw the look. "Won't you sit down?" she said, indicating the couch. "I promise not to make you snakes. I shan't even ask you to take off your gloves."

Loder made no movement. His mind was unpleasantly upset. It was nearly a fortnight since he had seen Lillian, and in his interval her attitude had changed, and the change puzzled him. It might mean the philosophy of a woman who, knowing herself without adequate weapons, withdraws from a combat that has proved fruitless, or it might imply the merry cattle dealer to toy with a certainty. He looked quickly at the delicate face, the green eyes suave and obligeant, the unbelievable mouth, and instantly he inclined to the latter theory. The conviction that she possessed the telegram filled him suddenly, and with it came the desire to put his belief to the test—to know beyond question whether her smiling unconcern meant malice or mere nonchalance.

"When you first came into the room," he said quietly, "you said 'I thought it would be you.' Why did you say that?"

Again she smiled—the smile that might be malicious or might be merely amused. "Oh," she answered at last, "I only meant that though I had been told Jack Chilcote wanted me, it wasn't Jack Chilcote I expected to see."

After her statement there was a pause. Loder's position was difficult. Instinctively realizing that she was strong in the possession of her proof, she was enjoying his tantalized discomfort, he yet feared that any persistence might arouse set his suspicions to rest. Acting upon the desire, he made a new beginning.

"Do you know why I came?" he asked.

Lillian looked up innocently. "It's so hard to be certain of anything in this world," she said. "But one is always at liberty to guess."

Again he was perplexed. Her attitude was not quite the attitude of one who controls the game, and yet— He looked at her with a puzzled scrutiny. Women for him had always spelled the incomprehensible. He was at his best, his strongest, his surest, in the presence of men. Feeling his disadvantage, yet determined to gain his end, he made a last attempt.

"How did you assume yourself at Grosvenor square this morning before Eve came to you?" he asked. The effort was awkwardly blunt, but it was direct.

Lillian was buttoning her glove. She did not raise her head as he spoke, but her fingers paused in their task. For a second she remained motionless; then she looked up slowly.

"Oh," she said sweetly, "so you're right in my guess. You did come to find out whether I sat in the morning room with my hands in my lap or wandered about in search of entertainment?"

Loder colored with annoyance and apprehension. At every turn the cool-ness of Lillian's was distasteful to him. No microscope could have revealed her more fully to him than did his own eyesight. But it was not the moment for personal antipathies; there were other interests than his own at stake. With new resolution he returned her glance.

"Then I must still ask my first question, Why did you say, 'I thought it would be you?'" His gaze was directness itself that it should be otherwise. She laughed a little uneasily.

"Because I knew."

"How did you know?"

"Because"— she began; then again she laughed. "Because," she added quickly, as if moved by a fresh impulse, "Jack Chilcote made it very obvious to any one who was in his morning room at 12 o'clock today that it would be you and not he who would be found filling his place this afternoon. It's all very well to talk about honor, but when one walks into an empty room and sees a telegram as big as a letter open on the bureau"—

But her sentence was never finished. Loder had heard what he came to hear. With a quick decision he might have to offer was of no moment in his eyes.

"My dear girl," he broke in brusquely, "don't trouble. I should make a most unsatisfactory father confessor." He spoke quickly. His color was still high, but not of anger. His sense of suspense was transformed into unpleasant certainty, but the exchange left him surer of himself. His perplexity had dropped to a quiet sense of self reliance. His paramount desire was for solitude in which to prepare for the task that lay before him—the most congenial task the world possessed—the unraveling of Chilcote's tangled affairs. Looking into Lillian's eyes, he smiled. "Goodby," he said, holding out his hand, "I think we've finished for today."

She slowly extended her fingers. Her expression and attitude were slightly puzzled — a puzzlement that was either spontaneous or singularly well assumed. As their hands touched she smiled again.

"Will you Crop in at the Arcadian to night?" she asked. "It's the most fascinated version of 'Other Men's Shoes.' The temptation to make you see it was the inducement to me to accept."

There was a pause while she waited for his answer, her head inclined to one shoulder, her green eyes gleaming.

Loder, conscious of her regard, hesitated for a moment. Then his face cleared. "I might," he said slowly. "The Arcadian tonight!"

CHAPTER XXIX.

LODER'S frame of mind as he left Cadogan gardens was peculiar. Once more he was living in the present—the fateful, exhilarating present, and the knowledge braced him. Upon one point his mind was satisfied. Lillian Astrupp had found the telegram, and it remained to him to render her find valueless. How he proposed to do this, how he proposed to come out triumphant in face of such a situation, was a matter that as yet was shadowless in his mind; nevertheless the despair, the sense of impending conflict, had a savor of life after the inanities of the day and night just passed. Chilcote in his weakness and his entanglement had turned to him, and he in his strength and capacity had responded to the appeal.

His step was firm and his bearing assured as he turned into Grosvenor square and walked toward the familiar house.

The habit of self deceit is as insidious and tenacious as any vice. For one moment on the night of his great speech as he leaned out of Chilcote's carriage and met Chilcote's eyes Loder had seen himself and his motive of revelation had taken decisive action. But in the hours subsequent to that action the plausible, inner voice that whispered unceasingly, soothing his wounded self esteem, rebuilding stone by stone the temple of his egotism, until at last when Chilcote, panic stricken at his own action, had burst into his rooms ready to plead and implore he had found no need for either exertion or entreaty. By a power more subtle and effective than any at his command Loder had been prepared for his coming—unconsciously ready with an acquiescence before his appeal had been made. It was the fruit of this preparation, the inevitable outcome of it, that strengthened his step and steadied his hand as he mounted the steps and opened the ball door of Chilcote's house on that eventful afternoon.

The dignity, the air of quiet solidity, impressed him as it never failed to do, as he crossed the hall and ascended the stairs—the same stairs that he had passed down almost as an outcast not so many hours before. He was filled with the sense of things regained. Belief in his own star lifted him, as it had done a hundred times before in these same surroundings.

He quickened his steps as the sensation came to him. Then, reaching the head of the stairs, he turned directly toward Eve's sitting room and, pushing the door, knocked. The strength of his eagerness, the quick beating of his pulse as he waited for a response, surprised him. He had told himself many times that his passion, however strong, would never again conquer as it had done two nights ago, and the fact that he had come thus candidly to Eve's room was to his mind a proof that temptation could be dared. Nevertheless there was something disconcerting in the silence that followed his knock, something of perturbation, and when Eve's voice came to him, giving permission to enter, he paused as he asked, before he obeyed himself. Then, with sudden decision, he opened the door and walked into the room.

The blinds were partly drawn, there was a scent of violets in the air, and a few pieces of sewing lay under the unsteady sensation in his brain, he moved forward, holding out his hand.

"Eve"— he said quickly, "Eve!"

But Eve remained motionless. As he came into the room she had glanced at him with a look of scrutinizing question, then with equal suddenness she had averted her eyes. As he drew close to her now she remained unmovable.

"Eve"— he said again. "I wanted to see you—I wanted to explain about yesterday and about this afternoon." He paused, suddenly disturbed. The full remembrance of the scene in the morning room at Grosvenor square, of her—had risen a fierce, unquenchable recollection. "Eve"— he began again in a new, abrupt tone.

And then it was that Eve showed herself in a fresh light. From his entrance into the room she had stayed motionless, save for her first glance of acute inquiry, but now her demeanor altered. By a gesture the first time in Loder's knowledge of her the vitality and force that he had vaguely appreciated in other days, but never seen, rior sprang up, like a flame within whose radius things are illuminated. With a quick gesture she turned toward him, her warm color deepening, her eyes suddenly alight.

"I understand," she said—"I understand. Don't try to explain. Can't you see that it's enough to—to see you here?"

Loder was surprised. Remembering their last passionate scene and the subsequent silence, he appreciated that must inevitably have cost upon it, he had expected to be doubtfully received but the reality of the reception left him bewildered. Eve's manner was not that of the ill used wife. Its vehemence, its air of desire and appreciation, were more suggestive of his own ardent seizing of the present as distinguished from past or future, and with a full sense of confusion he turned to her afresh.

"Then I am forgiven?" he said. And unconsciously as he moved nearer he touched her arm.

At his touch she started. All the yielding sweetness, all the submission, that had marked her two nights ago was gone. She shrank from him as she recoiled from the sudden, fierce pain of a woman of twenty-four. You must help me to be sensible." Her cheeks still burned, her manner was still excited, but she was no longer the unnerved nuisance of last night.

Loder looked at her uncertainly. "Eve"— he began afresh with his old, characteristic perseverance, but she instantly checked him. There was a finality, a faint suggestion of fear, in her protest.

"Don't" she said. "Don't! I don't want explanations. I want to—to enjoy the moment without having things analyzed or smoothed away. Can't you understand? Can't you see that I'm wonderfully, terribly happy to—to have you—as you are?" Again her voice broke—a break that might have been a laugh or a sob.

She stood was an emotional crisis, as such a sound invariably is. It arrested and steadied her. For a moment she stood absolutely still, then with something very closely resembling her old repose of manner she stooped again and quietly picked up the flowers still lying at her feet.

"Now," she said quickly, "I must say what I've wanted to say all along. How does it feel to be a great man?"

Her manner was controlled, she looked at him evenly and steadily; save for the faint vibration in her voice there was nothing to indicate the tumult of a few moments ago.

But Loder was still uncertain. He caught her hand, his eyes searching hers.

"But Eve"— he began.

Then Eve played the last card in her mysterious game. Laughing quickly and nervously, she freed her hand and held it over his mouth.

"No!" she said. "Not one word! All this past fortnight has belonged to you; now it's my turn. Today is mine."

CHAPTER XXX.

AND so, once again, the woman who was versed in philander Eve's intentions were, whatever she wished to evade or ward off, she was powerless to do it. Loder saw and recognized his guilelessness. For more than two hours she kept Loder at her side. There may have been moments when the strain of the tension was high, when the efforts she made to interest and hold him were somewhat pronounced. But if this was so it escaped the notice of the one person concerned, for it was long after Eve had gone that, several, long after Eve had offered to do penance for her monopoly of him by driving him to Chilcote's club, that Loder realized with any degree of distinctness that it was she and not he who had taken the lead in their interview; that it was she and not he who had bridged the difficult silences and given a fresh direction to dangerous channels of talk. It was long before he recognized this, bound was still under the influence of her presence, of the numberless intimate mal things that went to make up the value of life. It was this acknowledgment of personality that upheld him—the personality, the power that had carried him unswervingly through eleven colorless years; that had impelled him toward this new career when the new career had first been opened to him; that had been a way for him in this fresh existence against colossal odds; the indomitable force that had trampled out Chilcote's footmarks in public life, in private life—in love. It was a triumphant sense that clamored in his ears, something persistent and prophetic, with an undernote of menace—the cry of the human soul that has dared to stand alone.

His glance was keen and bright as he waited for a moment at the carriage door and took Eve's hand before entering the club.

"You're dining out tonight?" he said. His fingers, always tenacious and masterful, continued to hold hers. The impression that had driven him temporarily toward sacrifice had passed. His pride, his confidence and with them his force, had flowed back in full measure.

Eve, watching him attentively, paled a little. "Yes," she said, "I'm dining with the Bramfells."

"What time will you get home?" He scarcely realized why he put the question. The song of self assertion was triumphantly, and he responded without reflection.

Eve's eyes held hers, his fingers pressed her hand; the intense mastery of his will passed through her in a sudden wave of fear. Her lips parted in hesitation, but he, closely attentive of her expression, spoke again quickly.

"When can I see you?" he asked very quietly.

Again she was about to speak. She moved forward, as if some power unseen long suppressed trembled on her lips, ben her courage or her desire failed her. Fear, however, had gained the mastery over her eyes. "I shall be home at 11," she said below her breath.

Loder dined with Lukeby at Children's club, and so absorbing were the political interests of the hour—the negotiations of Sir Robert Sefton-Brown, the king's summoning of Fraide, the probable features of the new ministry—that it was after 9 o'clock when he found himself and drove to the Arcadian theater.

The sound of music came to him as he entered the theater—light, measured music suggestive of tiny streams, by smoke and palmed amphitheaters. It sounded singularly inappropriate to his mood—as inappropriate as the theater and its light thoughts and atmosphere of pink and blue. It was the setting of a different world—a world of weights, light thoughts and shallow impulses, in which he had no part.

It was the interval between the first and second acts. The box was in shadow, and Loder's first impression was of voices and rustling skirts, broken upon by the murmur of frequent amused laughter. Later, as his eyes grew accustomed to the light, he distinguished the occupants, two women and a man. The man was speaking as he entered, and the story he was relating was evidently received from the faint exclamations of question and delight that punctuated it in the listeners' higher, clearer voices.

"Ah, here comes the legislator!" exclaimed Leonard Kaine, for it was he who formed the male element in the party.

"The revolutionary, Lennie," Lillian corrected softly. "Bramfell says he has changed the whole face of things." She laughed softly and meaningly as she closed her fan. "Stand off you two, come, Jack," she added. "Let me introduce you to Miss Esseltyn. I don't think you two have met. This is Mr. Chilcote, Mary—the great—new Mr. Chilcote." Again she laughed.

Loder bowed and moved to the front of the box, nodding to Kaine as he passed.

"It's only for an hour," he explained to Lillian. "I have an appointment for 11."

"Only an hour! Oh, how unkind! How should I punish him, Lennie?" Lillian looked round at Kaine with a lingering, caressing glance.

He bent toward her in quick response and answered in a whisper.

She laughed and replied in an equally low tone.

Loder, to whom both remarks had been inaudible, dropped into the vacant seat beside Mary Esseltyn. He had the unsettled feeling that things were not falling out exactly as he had calculated.

"What is the play like?" he hazarded as he looked toward his companion. At all times social trivialities bored him. Tonight they were intolerable. He had come to fight, but all at once it seemed that there was no opponent. Lillian's attitude disturbed him; her careless graciousness, her evident ignoring of him for Kaine, might mean nothing, but also it might mean much.

"It is a good play," she responded. "I like it better than the book. You've read the book, of course?"

"No." Loder tried hard to fix his thoughts.

"It's amusing, but far fetched."

"Indeed?" He picked up the programme lying on the edge of the box. His eyes were strained to catch the tone of Lillian's voice as she laughed and whispered with Kaine.

"Yes; men exchanging identities, you know."

He looked up and caught the girl's self possessed glance. "Oh?" he said. "Indeed?" Then again he looked away. It was intolerable, this feeling of being caged up! A sense of anger crept through his mind. It almost seemed though Lillian had brought him there to prove that she had finished with him, had cast him aside, having used him for the gratification of an idle hour's curiosity. Turning swiftly in his seat, he glanced back to where she sat slowly swaying her fan, her pale, golden hair and her pale colored gown delicately silhouetted against the background of the box.

"What's your idea of the play, Lillian?" he said abruptly. To his own ears there was a note of challenge in his voice.

She looked around languidly. "Oh, it's quite amusing," she said. "It has a touch of a delicious farce—absolutely French."

"French?"

"Quite. Don't you think so, Lennie?"

"Oh, quite." Kaine agreed.

"They mean that it's so very light and yet so very subtle, Mr. Chilcote," Mary Esseltyn explained.

"Indeed?" he said. "Then my imagination was at fault. I thought the piece was serious."

"Serious!" Lillian smiled again. "Why, where's your sense of humor? The motive of the play debars all seriousness."

Loder looked down at the programme still between his hands. "What is the motive?" he asked.

Lillian waved her fan once or twice, then closed it softly. "Love is the motive," she said.

Now, the balancing—the adjusting of impression and inspiration—is, of all processes in life, the most delicately fine. The simple sound of the word "love" coming at that precise juncture changed the whole current of Loder's thought. It fell like a seed, and into the inner life which it was spoken trivial, but Loder's mind was attracted and held by it. The last time it had met his ears his environment had been vastly different, and this echo of it in an uncongenial atmosphere stung him to resentment. The vision of Eve, coming to the support of untimes appealed to Loder. It was the force of the real to which he turned in steel. With a new expression on his face, he turned again to Kaine.

"And how does it work?" he said. "This treatment that you find so—French?"

His voice as well as his expression had changed. He still spoke quietly, but he spoke with interest. He was no longer conscious of the vague uneasiness; a fresh chord had been struck in his mind, and his curiosity had responded to it. For the first time it occurred to him that love—the

CHAPTER XXVII.

BUT Loder did not leave London, and the hour of 2 on the day following his dismissal of Chilcote found him again in his sitting room.

He sat at the center table surrounded by a cloud of smoke; a pipe was between his lips and the morning's newspapers by his side beside his elbow. To the striking of humanity his attitude was intensely interesting. It was the attitude of a man trammeled by the shackles of his own strength. Before him as he sat smoking stretched a future of absolute nothingness, and toward this blank future one portion of his consciousness—a struggling one and as yet scarcely sentient portion—pushed him inevitably; while another—a vigorous, persistent, human portion—cried to him to pause, to control, so reasoning, was this silent mental conflict that had raged unceasingly since the moment of his reunion that at last in physical response to it he pushed back his chair.

"It's too late," he said aloud. "I'm a fool. It's too late."

Then abruptly, astonishingly as though in direct response to his spoken thought, the door opened and Chilcote walked into the room.

Slowly Loder rose and stared at him. The feeling he acknowledged to himself was anger, but below the anger a very different sensation ran riotously along. And it was in time to this second feeling, this sudden, lawless joy, that his pulses beat as he turned a cold face on the intruder.

"Well?" he said sternly.

But Chilcote was impervious to sternness. He was mentally shaken and distressed, though outwardly irreproachable, even to the violets in the lapel of his coat—the violets that for a week past had been brought each morning to the door of Loder's rooms by Eve's hand. For one second, as Loder's eyes rested on the flowers, a sting of ungovernable jealousy shot through him; then as suddenly it died away, superseded by another feeling—a feeling of deep spontaneous joy. Worn by Chilcote or by himself, the flowers were a symbol!

"Well?" he said again in a gentler voice.

Chilcote had walked to the table and laid down his hat. His face was white and the touch of his hand trembled seriously as he drew off his gloves.

"Thank heaven, you're here!" he said shortly. "Give me a drop of drink."

In silence Loder brought out the whisky and set it on the table; then instinctively he turned aside. Absolutely as though he saw the action he mentally figured Chilcote's furtive glance, the furtive movement of his fingers to his waistcoat pocket, the hasty dropping of the tabloids into the glass, for an instant the sense of his tacit connivance came to him sharply; the next, he flung it from him. The hubbub inner voice was whispering its old watchword. The strong man has no time to waste over his weaker brother!

When he heard Chilcote lay down his tumbler he looked back again. "Well, what is it?" he said. "What have you come for?" He strove resolutely to mask his voice severe but, try as he might, he could not quite subdue the sheer force that lay behind his words. Once again, as on the night of their second meeting, life had become a thing risking to fresh existence even as the sifted its ashes. "Well?" he said more curtly.

Chilcote had set down his glass. He was nervously passing his handkerchief across his lips. There was something in the gesture that attracted Loder. Looking at him more attentively, he noted that his every feeling and the man's conventional dress had blinded to the almost piteous panic and weakness mixed in his visitor's eyes.

"Something's gone wrong!" he said, with abrupt intuition.

Chilcote started. "Yes—no—that is, I—" he stammered.

Loder moved around the table. "Something's gone wrong," he repeated. "And you've come to tell me."

The tone unnerved Chilcote. He suddenly dropped into a chair. "It—it wasn't my fault!" he began. "I—I have had a horrible time!"

Loder's lips tightened. "Yes," he said, "yes, I understand."

The other glanced up with a gleam of his old suspicion. "Twas all my nerves, Loder!—

"Of course. Yes, of course," Loder's interruption was curt.

Chilcote eyed him doubtfully. Then recollection took the place of doubt, and a change passed over his expression. "It wasn't my fault," he began hastily. "On my soul, it wasn't! It was Crapham's beastly fault for showing her into the morning room"—

Loder kept silent. His curiosity had first next morning—this morning—at 12 o'clock"—

Loder turned to the table and poured himself out some whisky. "Yes," he acquiesced in a very quiet voice.

The hand Chilcote rose from his seat. His disquietude was very evident. "Oh, there was breakfast on the table when I came downstairs—bread, fast, with flowers and a horrible, dazzling glare of sun. It was then, Loder, as I stood and looked into the room, that the impossibility of it all came to me—that I knew I couldn't stand it—couldn't go on."

Loder swallowed his whisky slowly. His sense of overpowering curiosity had him very still, but he made no effort to prompt his companion.

Again Chilcote shifted his position agitatedly. "It had to be done," he said disjointedly. "I had to do it—then and there. The things were on the bureau—the pens and ink and telegraph forms. They tempted me."

Loder laid down his glass suddenly. An exclamation rose to his lips, but he checked it.

At the slight sound of the tumbler touching the table Chilcote turned, but there was no expression oh the other's face to affright him.

"They tempted me," he repeated hastily. "They seemed like magnets; they seemed to draw me toward them. I sat at the bureau staring at them for a long time. Then a terrible compulsion seized me—something you could never understand—and I caught up the nearest pen and wrote just what was in my mind. It wasn't a telegram, properly speaking. It was more a letter. I wanted you back, and I had to make myself plain. The writing of the message seemed to steady me; the mere forming of the words quieted my mind. I was almost cool when I got up from the bureau and pressed the bell"—

"The bell?"

"Yes. I rang for a servant. I had to send the wire myself, so I had to get a cab." His voice rose to irritability. "I pressed the bell several times, but the thing had gone wrong; 'twouldn't work. At last I gave it up and went into the corridor to call some one."

"Well?" In the intense suspense of the moment the word escaped Loder.

"Oh, I went out of the room, but there at the door, before I could call anybody, I knocked up against that idiot Greening. He was looking for me—for you, rather—about some beastly Wark affair. I tried to explain that I wasn't in a state for business. I tried to shake him off, but he was worse than Blessington! At last, to be rid of the fellow, I went with him to the study"—

"But the telegram?" Loder began. Then again he checked himself. "Yes—yes—I understand," he added quietly.

"I'm getting to the telegram! I wish you wouldn't jar me with sudden questions. I wasn't in the study more than a minute more than five or six minutes—when the voice became confused, the strain of the connected recital was telling upon him. With nervous haste he took a rush for the end of his story. "I wasn't more than seven or eight minutes in the study; then, as I came downstairs Crapham met me in the hall. He told me that Lillian Astrupp had called and wished to see me and that he had shown her into the morning room"—

"The morning room?" Loder suddenly stepped back from the table. "The morning room? With your telegram lying on the bureau?"

His sudden speech and movement startled Chilcote. The blood rushed to his face, then died out, leaving it ashen. "Don't do that, Loder!" he cried. "I—I can't bear it!"

With an immense effort Loder controlled himself. "Sorry," he said. "Go on!"

"I'm going on. I tell you I'm going on! I got a horrid shock when Crapham told me. I never once connected the two things in my mind. I knew Lillian had come to see you. I knew there was going to be a scene. When I got to the morning room I knew my mind was shaking so that I could scarcely turn the handle; then, as the door opened, I could have cried out

In his tense anxiety Loder ground his heel into the floor. "Go on!" he said fiercely. "Go on!"

"Don't!" Chilcote exclaimed. "I'm going on—I'm going on, Loder." He passed his handkerchief across his lips. "We talked for ten minutes or so, and then Lillian left. I went with her to the hall door, but Crapham was there too—so I was still safe. She laughed and chatted and seemed in high spirits as we crossed the hall, and she was still smiling as she waved to me from her hansom. Then, Loder, I came back into the room, that the impossibility of it all came to me—that I knew I couldn't stand it—couldn't go on."

Loder swallowed his whisky slowly. His sense of overpowering curiosity had him very still, but he made no effort to prompt his companion.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

LODER'S plan of action was arrived at before he reached Trafalgar square. The facts of the case were simple. Chilcote had left an unanswered telegram on the bureau in the morning room at Grosvenor square. By an unlucky chance Lillian Astrupp had been shown up into that room, where she had remained alone until the moment that Eve, either by request or by accident, had found her there. The facts resolved themselves into one question: What use had Lillian made of those solitary moments? Without hesitation, Loder's mind turned toward one answer. Lillian was not the woman to lose an opportunity, whether the space at her command was long or short.

So convinced was he that, reaching Trafalgar square, he stopped and hailed a hansom.

"Chelsea gardens!" he called. "No. 33."

The moments seemed very few before the cab drew up before the house, and he caught his accustomed glimpse of the enameled door with its silver fittings. Instantly he pressed the bell the door was opened by Lillian's discreet, deferential manservant.

"Is Lady Astrupp at home?" he asked.

The man looked thoughtful. "Her ladyship lunched at home, sir"—he began cautiously.

But Loder interrupted him. "Ask her to see me," he said inconsolably.

The servant expressed no surprise. His only comment was to throw the door wide.

"If you'll wait in the white room, sir," he said, "I'll inform her ladyship." Chilcote was evidently a frequent and a favored visitor.

In this manner Loder for the second time entered the house so unfamiliar and yet so familiar in all that it suggested. Entering the drawing room, he had leisure to look about him. It was a beautiful room, large and lofty. Luxury was evident on every hand, but it was not the luxury that palls or offends. Each object was graceful and possessed its own intrinsic value. The atmosphere was too effeminate to appeal to him, but he acknowledged the taste and artistic delicacy it conveyed. Almost at the moment of acknowledgment the door opened to admit Lillian.

"I thought it would be you," she said enigmatically.

Loder came forward. "You expected me?" he said guardedly. A sudden conviction filled him that it was the confidence of her eyes, but something at once subtler and more definite that prompted her recognition of him.

She smiled. "Why should I expect you? On the contrary, I'm waiting to know why you're here."

He was silent for an instant. Then he answered to her own light tone. "As far as that goes," he said, "let's make it my duty call—having called with you. I'm an old fashioned person."

For a full second she surveyed him amusedly. Then at last she spoke. "My dear Jack"—she laid particular stress on the name—"I never imagined you punctilious. I should have thought bohemian would have been more the word."

Loder felt disconcerted and annoyed. Either, like himself, she was fishing for information or she was deliberately quickly at the deliente face, the green eyes somewhat obliquely set, the unstable mouth, of instantly he inclined to the latter theory. The conviction that the possession of the telegram filled him suddenly, and with it came the desire to put his belief to the test—to know beyond question whether her smiling unconcern meant malice or mere entertainment.

"When you first came into the room," he said quietly, "you said 'I thought it would be you.' Why did you say that?"

Again she smiled—a smile that might be malicious or might be merely amused. "Oh," she answered at last, "I only meant that though I had been told Jack Chilcote wanted me, it wasn't Jack Chilcote I expected to see!"

After her statement there was a pause. Loder's position was difficult. Instinctively convinced that, strong in the possession of her proof, she was enjoying his tantalized discomfort, he yet craved the actual evidence that should set his suspicions at rest. Acting upon the desire, he made a new beginning.

"Do you know why I came?" he asked.

Lillian looked up innocently. "It's so hard to be certain of anything in this world," she said. "But one is always at liberty to guess."

Again he was perplexed. Her attitude was not quite the attitude of one who controls the game, and yet— He looked at her with a puzzled scrutiny. Women for him had always spelled the incomprehensible. He was at his best, his strongest, his surest, in the presence of men. Feeling his disadvantage, yet determined to gain his end, he made a last attempt.

"How did you amuse yourself at Grosvenor square this morning before Eve came to you?" he asked. The effort was awkwardly blunt, but it was direct.

Lillian was buttoning her glove. She did not raise her head as he spoke, but her fingers paused in their task. For a second she remained motionless; then she looked up slowly.

"Oh," she said sweetly, "so I was right in my guess. You did come to find out whether I sat in the morning room with my hands in my lap or wandered about in search of entertainment?"

Loder colored with annoyance and apprehension. Every look, every tone, of Lillian's was distasteful to him. No microscope would have revealed her more fully to him than did his own eyesight. But it was not the moment for personal antipathies; there were other interests than his own at stake. With new resolution he returned her glance.

"Then I must still ask my first question. Why did you say, 'I thought it would be you?'" His gaze was direct—so direct that it disconcerted her. She laughed a little uneasily.

"Because I knew."

"How did you know?"

"Because"—she began; then again she laughed. "Because," she added to him as apparently, whether the pause, "Jack Chilcote made it very obvious to any one who was in his morning room at 12 o'clock today that it would be you and not he who would be found filling his place this afternoon. It's all very well to talk about honor, but when one walks into an empty room and sees a telegram as long as a letter one can't help—"

But her sentence was never finished. Loder had heard what he came to hear. Any confession she might have to offer was of no moment in his eyes.

"My dear girl," he broke in brusquely, "don't trouble. I would make a most unsatisfactory father confessor." He spoke quickly. His color was still high, but out of annoyance. His suspense was transformed into unpleasant certainty, but the exchange left him master of himself. His perplexity had dropped to a quiet sense of self reliance. His paramount desire was for solitude in which to prepare for the task that lay before him—the most congenial task the world possessed—the rescue of Chilcote's tangled skeins. Looking into Lillian's eyes, he smiled. "Goodby," he said, holding out his hand. "I think we're finished—for today."

She slowly extended her fingers. Her expression and attitude were slightly puzzled — a puzzlement that was either spontaneous or singularly well assumed. As their hands touched she smiled again.

"Will you drop in at the Arcadian tonight?" she asked. "It's the first dramatized version of 'Other Men's Shoes.' The temptation to make you see it was too irresistible—as you know."

There was a pause while she waited for his answer, her head inclined to one side, her green eyes gleaming.

Loder, conscious of her regard, hesitated for a moment. Then his face cleared. "Gladly," he said slowly. "The Arcadian tonight!"

CHAPTER XXIX.

LODER'S frame of mind as he left Cadogan gardens was peculiar. Once more he was living in the present—the forceful, exhilarating present, and the knowledge braced him. Upon one point his mind was satisfied. Lillian Astrupp had found the telegram, and it remained to him to render her find valueless. How he proposed to do this, how he proposed to come out triumphant in face of such a attention, was a matter that as yet was shapeless in his mind; nevertheless the danger, the sense of impending conflict, had a savor of life after the inaction of the day and eight past passed. Chilcote in his weakness and his entanglement had turned to him, and he in his wounded self esteem, rebuilding stone by stone the temple of his egotism, unstable enough, instantly he inclined to the latter theory. The conviction that the possession of the telegram filled him suddenly, and with it came the desire to put his belief to the test—to know beyond question whether her smiling unconcern meant malice or mere entertainment.

"When you first came into the room," he said quietly, "you said 'I thought it would be you.' Why did you say that?"

Again she smiled—a smile that might be malicious or might be merely amused. "Oh," she answered at last, "I only meant that though I had been told Jack Chilcote wanted me, it wasn't Jack Chilcote I expected to see!"

After her statement there was a pause. Loder's position was difficult. Instinctively convinced that, strong in the possession of her proof, she was enjoying his tantalized discomfort, he yet craved the actual evidence that should set his suspicions at rest. Acting upon the desire, he made a new beginning.

"Do you know why I came?" he asked.

Lillian looked up innocently. "It's so hard to be certain of anything in this world," she said. "But one is always at liberty to guess."

Again he was perplexed. Her attitude was not quite the attitude of one who controls the game, and yet— He looked at her with a puzzled scrutiny. Women for him had always spelled the incomprehensible. He was at his best, his strongest, his surest, in the presence of men. Feeling his disadvantage, yet determined to gain his end, he made a last attempt.

"How did you amuse yourself at Grosvenor square this morning before Eve came to you?" he asked. The effort was awkwardly blunt, but it was direct.

Lillian was buttoning her glove. She did not raise her head as he spoke, but her fingers paused in their task. For a second she remained motionless; then she looked up slowly.

"Oh," she said sweetly, "so I was right in my guess. You did come to find out whether I sat in the morning room with my hands in my lap or wandered about in search of entertainment?"

Loder colored with annoyance and apprehension. Every look, every tone, of Lillian's was distasteful to him. No microscope would have revealed her more fully to him than did his own eyesight. But it was not the moment for personal antipathies; there were other interests than his own at stake. With new resolution he returned her glance.

"Then I must still ask my first question. Why did you say, 'I thought it would be you?'" His gaze was direct—so direct that it disconcerted her. She laughed a little uneasily.

"Because I knew."

"How did you know?"

"Because"—she began; then again she laughed. "Because," she added to him as apparently, whether the pause, "Jack Chilcote made it very obvious to any one who was in his morning room at 12 o'clock today that it would be you and not he who would be found filling his place this afternoon. It's all very well to talk about honor, but when one walks into an empty room and sees a telegram as long as a letter one can't help—"

But her sentence was never finished. Loder had heard what he came to hear. Any confession she might have to offer was of no moment in his eyes.

"My dear girl," he broke in brusquely, "don't trouble. I would make a most unsatisfactory father confessor." He spoke quickly. His color was still high, but out of annoyance. His suspense was transformed into unpleasant certainty, but the exchange left him master of himself. His perplexity had dropped to a quiet sense of self reliance. His paramount desire was for solitude in which to prepare for the task that lay before him—the most congenial task the world possessed—the rescue of Chilcote's tangled skeins. Looking into Lillian's eyes, he smiled. "Goodby," he said, holding out his hand. "I think we're finished—for today."

She slowly extended her fingers. Her expression and attitude were slightly puzzled — a puzzlement that was either spontaneous or singularly well assumed. As their hands touched she smiled again.

There was a pause while she waited for his answer, her head inclined to one side, her green eyes gleaming.

a laugh or a sob.

The sound was an emotional crisis, as such a sound invariably is. It arrested and steadied her. For a moment she stood absolutely still, then with something very closely resembling her old repose of manner she stooped again and quietly picked up the flowers still lying at her feet.

"Now," she said quietly, "I must say what I've wanted to say all along. How does it feel to be a great man?"

Her manner was controlled, she looked at her companion with a smile that for the faint vibration in her voice there was nothing to indicate the tumult of a moment past.

But Loder was still uncertain. He caught her hand, his eyes searching hers.

"But Eve"— he began.

Then Eve played the last card in her armory of weapons. Laughing quickly and nervously, she freed her hand and laid it over his mouth.

"No!" she said. "Not one word! All this past fortnight has belonged to you; now it's my turn. Today is mine."

CHAPTER XXX.

AND so, once again, the woman had overcome. Laughing gaily her intentions were, whatever she wished to evade or ward off, she was powerful in gaining her end. For more than two hours she kept Loder at her side. There may have been moments in the course of them when the tension was high, when the efforts she made to interest and hold him were unnatural and forced. But if this was so it escaped the notice of the one person concerned, for it was long after tea had been served, long after Eve had offered to do penance for her monopoly of him by driving him to Chilcote's club, that Loder realized with any degree of distinctness that it was she and not he who had taken the lead in their interview; that it was she and not he who had bridged the difficult silences and given a fresh direction to danger-haunted channels of talk. It was long before he recognized this, but it was still longer before he realized the far more potent fact that without any coldness, without any lessening of the subtle consideration she always showed him, she had given him no further opportunity of making love.

Talking continuously, elated with the sense of results still to come, he drove with her to the club. Considering that drive in the light of after events, his sense of ease and invariably filled him with incredulity in the eyes of any sane man his position was not unlike that of a purchaser, yet in the blind self confidence of the moment he would not have changed places with any lover in London. Eve's close presence, of the numberless infinitesimal things that went to make up the value of life, instead of this acknowledgment of personality that upheld him—the personality, the power that had barred him inevertingly though at seven colorless years; that had impelled him toward this new career when the discovery of her first love opened to him; that had hewn the way for him in this fresh existence against colossal odds, the indomitable force that had trampled out Chilcote's footmarks in public life, in private life—in love. It was stimulant pasts that obscured in his care, something persistent and prophetic, with an undernote of menace, the eyes of the human soul that has dared to stand alone.

His glance was keen and bright as he waited for a moment at the carriage door and took Eve's hand before entering the club.

"You are shining out tonight!" he said. His fingers, always tenacious and masterful, continued to hold hers. The compunction that had driven him temporarily toward sacrifice had passed. His pride, his confidence and with them his desire, find flowed back in full measure.

Eve, watching him attentively, paled a little. "Yes," she said, "I'm dining with the Bramfells."

"What time will you get home?" He scarcely realized why he put the question. The song of self still sounded triumphantly, and he responded without reflection.

His eyes held hers, his fingers pressed her hand; the intense mastery of his will passed through her in a sudden access of fear. Her lips parted in expectation, but he, closely attentive of her expression, spoke again quickly.

"When can I see you?" he asked very quietly.

Again she was about to speak. She looked at him, and if some thought long suppressed trembled on her lips, ben her courage or her desire failed her. She leaned back, letting her arm drop over her eyes. "I shall be home at 11," she said below her breath.

Loder closed with Lalsley at Chilcote's club, and so absorbing were the political interests of the hour—the resignation of Sir Robert Sefborough, the ding's summoning of Fraide, the probable features of the new ministry—that of the next as opposed to the ideal. With a new expression on his face, he turned again to Kaine.

"And how does it work?" he said. "This treatment that you find so—French?"

His voice as well as his expression had changed. He still spoke quietly, but he spoke with interest. He was no longer conscious of the vague uneasiness; a fresh chord had been struck in his mind, and his curiosity had responded to it. For the first time it occurred to him that love—the dangerous, mysterious garden whose paths had no ending but stretched out before Bi-own feet—was a pleasure ground that possessed many doors and an infinite variety. Then he was stirred by the desire to peer through another entrance than his own, to see the secret, buried terrace from another standpoint. He waited with interest for the answer to his question.

For a second or two Kaine stretched out to survey the house; then his eyeglass dropped from his eye, and he turned round.

"To understand the thing," he said pleasantly, "you must have read the book. Have you read the book?"

"No, Mr. Kaine," Mary Eoselyn interjected. "Mr. Chilcote hasn't read the book."

Lillian laughed. "Outline the story for him, Lonnie," she said. "I love to see other people taking pains."

Kaine glanced at her admiringly. "Well, to begin with," he said amiably, "my hero, an artist and a millionaire, performs flaws. See?"

"You may presume that he does see, Lonnie."

"Right! Well, then, as I say, these bizarre things—blotches, they're as like as pins, and to all appearances are things the other ship—and the other people the first ship. See?"

Lolder laughed. The newly quickened interest was enhanced by treading on firmer ground.

"Well, they do fare for a lark, of course, but there's one fact they both overlook. They're men, you know, and they forget those little things." He laughed delightfully. "They overlook the fact that one of 'em has got a wife!"

There was a crash of music from the orchestra. Lolder sat straighter in his chair. He was conscious that the blood had rushed into his face.

"Oh, indeed!" he said quickly. "One hadn't heard a wife mentioned."

"Exactly!" Arthur Kaine chuckled. "And the point of the joke is that the wife is the best living person under the sun. See?"

A second hot wave passed over Lolder's face. He turned sharply and looked out. The moon was the wonderful garden with its smaller standard trees and its fallen grass—cold, shrouded and shadowy, to the young girl beside him, so frankly modern in her appreciation of life. This, then was love as seen by the eyes of the world—the world that never dreamed and confessions in a slang phrase or two! Very slowly the blood receded from his face.

"And the end of the story?" he asked in a strained voice.

"The end? Oh, usual end, of course. Chap makes a mess of things and the couple separate."

"And the end of the wife?"

"The end of the wife?" Lillian broke in with a little laugh. "Why, the end of all stupid people who, instead of making much fuss with a lot or delightfully human stumbles, even just one big crasher. She naturally sails in the direction—up!"

They all laughed boisterously. Then Lolder, story and denouement were all drowned in a tumultuous crash of music. The orchestra ceased; there was a slight turn of applause, and the curtain rose on the second act.

CHAPTER XXXI.

A FEW minutes before the curtain fell on the second act of "Other Men's Shoes" Lolder rose from his seat and made his apologies to Lillian.

At any other moment he might have pondered over her manner of receiving them. She was quite cool and self-possessed, which she let him see. But vastly keener issues were claiming his attention, issues where results were wide and black.

He left the theatre and, refusing the conveyance, he turned to walk to Chilcote's house. His face was hard and emotionless as he hurried forward, but the color in his mind found expression in the unevenness of his pace. To a stranger than the confronting of difficult issues never alarming and is often fraught with inspiration, but this applies essentially to the difficulties of somebody else's business, the folly or the force of another; when they arise from within the matter is of another complexion. It is in presence of his own soul, and in that presence alone, that a man may truly measure himself.

As Lolder walked onward, treading the whole familiar length of traffic filled with the needless, set hissed for time that he was standing before this solemn tribunal—that the hour had come when he must answer to himself for himself. The longer and deeper an oblivion the more painful the awakening. For months the song of self had beaten about his ears, deadening all other sounds; now abruptly that song had ceased, not considerately, not lingeringly, but with a suddenness that made the succeeding silence very terrible.

He walked onward, keeping his direction unswervingly. He was passing through the fire as surely as though actual flames rose about his feet, and whatever the result, whatever the fiber of the man who emerged from the ordeal, the John Lolder who had been his way through the past weeks would exist no more. The stimulant or opiate, the strong man who by his own strength had kept his eyes upon one point, refusing to see in other directions, had ceased to be.

Keen though it was, his realization of this crisis in his life had come with characteristic slowness. When Lillian Aspripp had given her dictum, when the noise of the orchestra had ceased and the curtain risen on the second act of the play, nothing but a sense of suspectation had filled his mind. In that moment the great song was silenced, not by any contentious episode, not by any incident that could have lent dignity to its end, but, with the full measure of life's irony, by a trivial social commonplace. In the first sensation of blank loss his faculties had been numbed. In the quarter of an hour that followed the rise of the curtain he had sat staring at the stage, seeing nothing, hearing nothing, filled with the enormity of the void that suddenly surrounded him. Then from habit, from constitutional tendency, he had begun slowly and perseveringly to draw first one thread and then another from the tangle of his thoughts, to forge with doubt and diffidency the chain that was to draw him toward the future.

It was upon this same incomplete and yet tenacious chain that his mind worked as he transversed the familiar streets and at last gained the house he had so easily learned to call home.

As he inserted the latchkey and felt it move smoothly in the lock a momentary revolt against his own judgment, his own censorship, swung him sharply toward reaction. But it is only the blind who can walk without a tremor on the edge of an abyss, and there was no longer a bandage across his eyes. The reaction flared up like a strip of lighted paper; then, like a strip of lighted paper, it dropped black to ashes. He pushed the door open and slowly crossed the hall.

The stumbling of a staircase is often the index to a man's state of mind. As Lolder ascended the stairs of Chilcote's house his steadiness lacked their sureness, his head was no longer erect. He moved as though his feet were weighted. He had ceased to be the man of achievement whose smallest ambition compels consideration. In the privacy of solitude he was the mere human foam to which he had once compared himself—the flotsam that, dreaming it was found further, wakes to find itself the prey of the incoming tide.

He paused at the head of the stairs to rally his resolution. Then he walked heavily, he passed down the corridor to Eve's room. It was suggestive of his character that, having made his decision, he did not dally over its performance. Without waiting to knock, he turned the handle and walked into the room.

It looked precisely as it always looked, but to Lolder it was rich, subdued coloring of books and flowers—the whole air of culture and repose that the place conveyed—seemed vest to the making of a deeper meaning than before, and it was on the instant that his eyes, crossing the intimate objects, rested on their owner that the true force of his position, the enormity of the task before him, made itself plain. Realization came to him with vivid, overwhelming force, and it must be accounted to his credit in the summing of his qualities that then, in that moment of trial, the thought of retreat, the thought of yielding, did not present itself.

Eve was standing by the mantelpiece. She wore a beautiful gown, a long string of diamonds was twisted about her neck, and her soft, black hair was coiled high after a foreign fashion and held in place by a large diamond comb. As he entered she turned hastily, almost nervously, and looked at him with the rapid, searching glance he had learned to expect from her. Then almost directly her expression changed to one of quick concern. With a faint exclamation of alarm she stepped forward.

"What has happened?" she said. "You look like a ghost."

Lolder made no answer. Moving into the room, he passed by the oak table that stood between the fireplace and the door.

They made an unconscious tableau as they stood there—he with his haggard face, she with her heightened color, her inexplicably bright eyes. They stood completely still for a space—a space that for Lolder held no consecution of time. Then, finding the tension unbearable, Eve spoke again.

"Has anything happened?" she asked. "Is anything wrong?"

Lolder knew he possessed the intensity of her concern might have struck him, but in a mind so harassed as his there was only room for one consideration—the consideration of himself. The sense of her question reached him, but its significance left him untouched.

"Is anything wrong?" she reiterated for the second time.

By an effort he raised his eyes. No man, he thought, since the beginning of the world was ever set a task so cruel as his. Painfully and slowly his lips parted.

"Everything in the world is wrong," he said in a slow, hard voice.

Eve said nothing, but her color suddenly deepened.

Again Lolder was unobservant, but with the dogged resolution that marked him he forced himself to his task.

"You despise lies," he said at last. "Tell me what you would think of a man whose whole life was one elaborated lie." He words were slightly exaggerated, but their utterance, their painfully brusque sincerity, precluded all suggestion of effect. Resolutely holding her gaze, he repeated his question.

"Tell me! Answer me! I want to know."

Eve's attitude was difficult to read. She stood twisting the string of diamonds between her fingers.

"Tell me!" he said again.

She continued to look at him for a moment; then, as if some fresh impulse moved her, she turned away from him toward the fire.

"I cannot," she said. "Why—I—I could not set myself to judge—any one."

Lolder held himself rigidly in hand.

"Eve," he said quietly, "I was at the Lyceum luncheon. The play was 'Other Men's Shoes.' I suppose you've read the book 'Other Men's Shoes'?"

She was leaning on the mantelpiece, and her face was invisible to him. "Yes, I've read it," she said without looking round.

"It is the story of an extraordinary likeness," he said quietly. "I was at a loss to understand the point. Do you think such a thing could exist?" He spoke with difficulty. His brain and tongue both felt numb.

Eve let the diamond chain slip from her fingers. "Yes," she said nervously. "Yes, I do believe it. Such things have been."

Lolder caught at the words. "You're quite right," he said quickly. "You're quite right. The thing is possible. I've proved it. I know a man so like me that you, even you, could not tell us apart."

Eve was silent, still averting her face.

In dire difficulty he labored on. "Eve," he began once more, "such a likeness is a serious thing—a terrible danger, a terrible temptation. Those who have no experience of it do not possibly grasp its pitfalls"— Again he paused, but again the silent figure by the fireplace gave no help.

"Eve," he exclaimed suddenly, "if you only knew, if you only guessed what I'm trying to say"— The perplexity, the whole horrible suffering of his mind showed in the words. Lolder, the strong, the resourceful, the self confident, was palpably, painfully at a loss. There was almost a note of appeal in the vibration of his voice.

And Eve, standing by the fireplace, heard and understood. In that moment of comprehension all that had held her silent, all the conflicting motives that had forbidden speech, melted away. She face the unconscious demand for help, quietly and simply she turned, her whole face transformed by a light that seemed to shine from within—some thing stupidly soft and tender.

"There's no need to say anything," she said simply. "Anything I know."

It came quietly, as most great revelations come. Her voice was low and free from any excitement, her face beautified in its complete unconsciousness of self. In that supreme moment all her thought, all her sympathy, was for the man and his suffering.

To Lolder there was a sense of incredulity; then his brain slowly swung to realization. "You know?" he repeated blankly. "You know?"

Without answering, she walked to a writing table that stood in the window, unlocked a drawer and drew out several sheets of flimsy white paper, crumpled and creased and closely covered with writing. Without a word she carried them back and held them out.

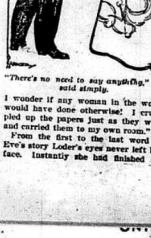
Lolder took them in silence, scanned them, then looked up.

In a large, worthless purse their eyes met. It was as if each looked into speechlessly into the other's heart, stripped of passions, the contradictions, the short-comings, and saw—not the end of both. In that silence they drew closer together than they could have done in the closest embrace, forever out of words. There was no asking of forgiveness, no passionate confession, on either side. In the silence each took them in absolutely, and understood.

"When I came into the corridor from outside," Eve said at last, "and saw Lillian Astripp reading that I seemed to know nothing could have seemed further from the truth. The thought that I should follow for example. It was not until afterward—not until—he came into the room—until I saw that you, as I believed, had fallen back again that I knew what I respected to what I—I—loved—that I knew how intensely I really was. As I watched them laugh and talk I felt suddenly that I was alone again—terribly alone. I—I think—I believe I was jealous in that moment"— She hesitated.

"Eve!" he exclaimed.

But she broke in quickly on the word. "I felt different in that moment. I didn't even regard honor or things like honor. After they had gone it occurred to me that I had missed something—something that they possessed. Oh, you don't know what a woman feels when she is jealous!" Again she paused. "It was then that the telegram and the thought of Lillian's amused smile as she had read it came to my mind. Reading as I did—acting on what I felt—I crossed to the bureau and picked it up. In one second I had seen enough to make it impossible to draw back. Oh, it may have been dishonorable, it may have been mean, but



"There's no need to say anything," she said simply.

I wonder if any woman in the world would have done otherwise! I crumpled up the papers just as they were and carried them to my own room."

From the first to the last word of Eve's story Lolder's eyes never left her face. Instantly she had finished his voice broke forth in irrepressible question. In that wonderful space of time he had learned many things. All his deductions, all his apprehensions, had been scattered and disproved. He had seen the true meaning of Lillian Astrupp's amused indifference—the difference of a variable, flippant nature that, robbed of any real weapon for mischief, soon tires of a game that promises to be too arduous. He saw all this and understood it with a rapidity born of the moment; nevertheless, when Eve ceased to speak the question that broke from him was not connected with this great discovery —was not even suggestive of it. It was something quite immaterial to any real issue, but something that overshadowed every consideration in the world.

"Eve," he said, "tell me your first thought—your first thought after the shock and the surprise—when you remembered me."

There was a fresh pause, but one of very short duration; then Eve met his glance fearlessly and frankly. The same pride and dignity, the same indescribable tenderness that had responded to his first appeal, shone in her face.

"My first thought was a great thankfulness," she said simply. "A thankfulness that you—that no man—could ever understand."

BONDS OF PATRIOTISM

NATIONAL SORROW LEADS TO FEELING OF BROTHERHOOD.

FIGHTING FOR OUR PRINCIPLES

Story of the Captured Flags—A Statesman's Curse—Emblem of Many Heroic Deeds—Bravery of the Past —Love Is All-Conquering—Stronger Than the Sword—Union Is Strength.

Los Angeles, Cal., May 26.—In this sermon, appropriate to the time, the old, tender theme of a nation's misery and how it was healed received new treatment, and the lesson is learned of a great people united in the bonds of a common patriotic brotherhood. The text is Jonah xlvii, 6, "I will say to the north, Give up, and to the south, keep not back."

I sometimes think we make a mistake when we think of the civil war as ending at Appomattox. The wounds were too fresh then on both sides. We know that the war is ended now, and I think the beginning of the end dated about twenty years ago. The beginning of the end came in a letter which Adjutant General R. C. Drum on April 30, 1887, addressed to Hon. W. C. Endicott, Secretary of War in President Cleveland's Cabinet. In this letter he suggested that the priety of returning all the flags (Union and Confederate), which had been captured in the late civil war by the authorities of the states in which the regiments which originally held them were organized.

No sooner did President Cleveland allow Secretary Endicott to approve the suggestion of his adjutant-general than a great howl of indignation arose. By one of the leading newspapers of Minnesota, Cleveland was assailed with opprobrious epithets. The newspapers east and west excoriated him. Over the public platforms Gen. R. F. Butler, Gen. Lucius Fairchild, commander-in-chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, Mared Halstead and others hurled their vituperation. The then governor of Ohio wrote a letter, which Senator John Sherman indorsed, in which he emphatically refused to surrender the flags, saying, "No rebel flags shall be returned while I am governor." Gen. Fairchild said: "May God palsy the hand that wrote the order. May God palsy the hand that countersigned it, and may God palsy the tongue that dictated it." An overwhelming vote of censure at the sound of the cannon's explosion was the only response he had an issue. They said, "Let us decide this issue once for all at the cannon's mouth." And when the end of battles decided against them these people said, "Let us have it over dead." The Northerner said: "Here, then, are the flags; we are your flags. We have no difference." Lolder. Take them back as heroic emblems of your glorious deeds of many battle fields." Take them and keep them in your children to look upon with reverence and awe. They are ours and not ours. We are all brothers. Of that fact I have no intention." Oh, to-day thank God that these questions are all settled and that all the old heart burnings are over. The returning of the Southern flags proved it.

There was still another reason why these old flags were returned. No sooner was the question settled than Southern men began to work side by side with their Northern countrymen for the upbuilding of the nation. They dropped the sword for the plow, the gun for the musket and pruning hook. They did more—they began to work for the benefit of the north as well as for the south, for the west as well as for the east. And as in the Spanish-American war Gen. Joe Wheeler served upon the staff of Fitz-Hugh Lee and Joe Wheeler rode under the stars and stripes by the side of Lawton, so they did side by side in congressional halls and on judicial bench and bar, in executive establishment the Southerners worked with the Northerners for the development of our whole country. They could not find any difference in these men's devotion to the flag of their birth.

I was very much struck with this fact when my mind ran over the names prominent in our national legislative halls thirty years ago. A number of statesmen had entered Washington from the Southern states. Nearly all of these men had worn the Confederate gray or been prominent in Richmond. There were Alexander Stephens and Lamar and Harris and Gordon and Pugh and Benjamin and Wade Hampton and Zebulon Vance and P. M. Cockrell and M. C. Butler and Berry and a great number of others too numerous to mention. My, what a list there was! When we read their names it seems as though we could hear the bugle calls, the rattling of arms and the yelling of the cavalry charge. When we look into the United States senate of thirty years ago it seems as though the field officers of a great Confederate army had been collected for a council of war. But, though those Southern statesmen assembled in Washington, they were not assembled for a council of war, but for a council of peace. Those ex-Confederate soldiers were planning and contriving for the prosperity of the whole United States and not for a part. They were working hand and glove with their Northern colleagues for the success of our reunited land. And, though the North, as a whole, in the early seventies did not have confidence in the loyalty of the new South, the Northern statesmen in Washington who came in touch with those Southern statesmen learned to trust the South.

When such true leaders as Charles Sumner, from Massachusetts, and Lucius Lamar, from Mississippi, and hundreds and thousands of men like them could strive as soon as the civil war was over to weld this broad country together, is it any wonder that after awhile the rank and file should fall into line and cry, "My country, men, know one another and you will love one another?" Oh, yes, the reborn of the Confederate flags by the North was a natural sequence to such a patriotic spirit as that. No sooner was the Appomattox treaty signed than the fire spirit of love for all over the South started in to obliterate sectional strife.

Lastly, I remark that the North gave back the Confederate flags because these two sections of our country, by travel and intercommunication, got acquainted and learned to know each other. Northerners traveled South, and they had a taste of Southern hospitality, including the hot breeds and the johnnycakes, and they like them. And the Southerners traveled north and learned that there was a new prosperation began to grow up which knew not Joseph. The college boys of the North would persist in falling in love with the bright eyed maidens from the South. The sons of the old Southern brigadier generals would persist in attaching the fireside of their fathers' old enemies and carrying away the Northern girls as willing captives in the old war called love. Cupid's darts were flying everywhither until at last the ice broke and said, "Why, those Southern boys are not born with horns and cloven feet." And the Northern girls were saying, "Why, those Northerners do love something besides the dollar." Then the golden cords of affection began to intwine themselves about Northern heart and Southern heart until the same blood by the cradle was being poured through the arteries of both. Had the North thrown the South and the South known the North in 1857 as they have since, the civil war had been no civil war. That war for the most part was caused by the ignorance of the different sections of our land.

Thus, brave men of the North and brave men of the South, in the name of our reunited country before this approaching Memorial day I salute you. You two chaps, who for love have so nobly proved to the world that you are material braver and greater than this; that you are moral and spiritual heroes. You have not only proved to the world that the civil war you have engage and backbone enough to fight, but that you also have mobility of soul enough to forget and forgive past differences. In this beautiful land of ours for 364 days out of the year we only want one flag. That flag must be stars and stripes. We want it waving from every home and schoolhouse and every church and public building. But on the spring Memorial day we like to see the flag of the old Confederate flag for a little while waving by the side of the stars and stripes, which once battled with it. That Confederate flag is the emblem of many a heroic deed of true American heart, as the United States flag is also the emblem of many a true heroic deed.

Oh, the bravery of the past, when the great armies of the North and the South were in mortal conflict! Did not the two armies also respect the bravery and nobility of each other and their foes? Was not the respect at Fredericksburg, May 22, 1863, the commanding general of the Union army united in honor of Illinois volunteers to charge a redoubt occupied by the Second infantry of Texas. As the Northern regiment moved forward to the charge the colonel gave the command: "Boys, don't look back. Keep your faces to and the enemy and charge." On and on, on, on they went. Under the withering fire of the enemy the Northern regiment would not retreated. But the color bearer of that regiment, Thomas Higgins by name, was fleetly footed than the rest. He caught up with the flag in the charge and moved straight ahead. He did not know that his companions had turned back. He kept his face toward the enemy. And there he was, the color bearer, with the old flag flying high over his head, charging alone a thousand men in gray. Then rose like the fiery from the Confederate ranks: "Don't shoot that boy! Let the brave fellow live!" And so Thomas Higgins, the color bearer, carrying the old flag of the Union, moved over at last in the Confederate soldiers opened their ranks and swallowed him up and then sent him back again a free man.

If the brave soldiers of old could be so merciful to each other, can we not be just as forgiving to-day? Are southern states have given back to the Southern states the Confederate flags. By that symbol we say, "The war of 1861 has forever passed away." But let us enter into another communion. Let the South to-day bring out her old tattered flags and let the northern soldiers bring out to-day again their old Union flags. And let the ragged folds of these old flags be wrapped about each other as North and South to-day clasp hands. They are brothers. We have the same God, we have the same land. And as one nation we will ask God to bless the common heritage of the dead—the dead boys in blue and the boys in gray." Thank God for the day when the Northern states returned the Confederate flags captured by battle. By that act they truly and forever declared their brotherly hearts in love. Yes, at last the North and the South are truly united and are one.

A Precaution.

"Good!" exclaimed a Welsh hotel proprietor as a departing guest proceeded to photograph the establishment. "I rejoice to see that you take an interest in the place. Perhaps you will send me a little memento of your visit. It shows you have been happy here. Is it not so?"

"Not exactly," was the morose answer. "I'm taking it to prevent any chance of my making a mistake and coming here again."

Oren Merkley, who resided near Maxville, Ont., and who was struck by lightning about two weeks ago, died Friday night, after suffering great agony. The manner in which the electric fluid struck him on the occasion when Mr. Merkley was injured was truly remarkable. He had come up from his farm about three miles from Maxville to visit a friend's house, and was sitting in the front kitchen. His foot was resting on the rung of the stove when the electric flash struck it, tore off the boot, and passing up his leg circled his body and leaped from his hand to an iron pump handle behind him and thence made its journey by the cistern. The victim was badly burned and his sufferings up to the time of death were intense.

A PROGRESSIVE FIRM.

Within the last few weeks The Dominion Hook Drill & Pouldry Co., Limited, have installed several of the latest and most up-to-date machines in their already well equipped machine shop, the latest acquisition being a mammoth lathe of the Mc-Dougall make, which weighs over five tons. The Company found this necessary on account of the size of the machines they are building now and the increase in business. They have contracted with Mussens Limited, of Montreal, for their entire output of mining hoists, and received orders yesterday for five of these machines.

They have also added a twist drill grinder and a multiple spindle drill, which will place them in a position to handle their increasing patronage in a speedy manner.

Our townspeople requiring any of the class of work turned out in a first-class machine shop should appreciate the progressiveness of The Drill Company and leave their work at home instead of sending away for something that can be handled by this Company.

Visitors desirous of looking over the plant will be cordially welcomed by Mr. E. J. Roy, the manager, and the growth of this once small company will surprise a good many of our citizens.

The death of Mr. Almon C. Tobey occurred at the family residence, west Main street, at an early hour on Monday morning, 10th June. About two years ago he had a severe stroke from which he never recovered, gradually growing worse until death. He was a great sufferer, but bore it patiently to the end. The deceased came to Picton from Napanee about twenty odd years ago, engaging in the jewelry business, and was one of the most affable and successful business men. He was twice married—his first wife being Miss Minnie Haight; the second Miss Ida Hurlbut. Two children by his first wife—Raymond and Zella—survive him to mourn the loss of a kind and loving father, deceased was 47 years of age. The funeral took place on Wednesday afternoon at 4 o'clock. The Editor of The Beaver:

Dear Mr. Editor,—I thought it might interest your many readers if I gave you a brief outline of the experiences, sights and scenes we have passed through and witnessed since we left England for Rome.

The Roman's Fifth Annual Sunday School Convention is now being held in Rome and there are 1,200 delegates here; 600 from Canada and United States, 200 from England and Scotland, and the remainder from all over the globe. I left London about the party from England, on May 16th, but joined them at Boulogne in France the following day, when all proceeded to Paris.

At Paris we joined the pilgrim party, and at 9:30 p.m. Wednesday night we left Paris for Rome. We were split up into parties of four and six, according to the size of the compartments in the cars. At Paris I met Miss Anderson, lady from Portland, Ore., joined her other American friends who were going to Rome, and found herself alone. She did not know a soul in the party. As she was sitting next to me I volunteered to see her through until she could join her own friends, who arrived in Rome next day after myself. I was a Canadian lady standing on the platform at Paris, and under the circumstances I think I was introducing myself as a fellow countryman and sailing but to join no American friend as a companion, which she willingly did as she was also alone. We then made up a party of four by inviting a London gentleman to join us, and settled down for our journey to Rome.

About daylight on Thursday we reached Chambery where the train stopped 20 minutes for coffee, so they call the light breakfast they serve us. We then entered the grand passes leading up to the Alps, and as soon your stomach just when you take them, that they are not hurting you, for they are.

The Editor of The Beaver:

Dear Mr. Editor,—I thought it might interest your many readers if I gave you a brief outline of the experiences, sights and scenes we have passed through and witnessed since we left England for Rome.

The Roman's Fifth Annual Sunday School Convention is now being held in Rome and there are 1,200 delegates here; 600 from Canada and United States, 200 from England and Scotland, and the remainder from all over the globe. I left London about the party from England, on May 16th, but joined them at Boulogne in France the following day, when all proceeded to Paris.

At Paris we joined the pilgrim party, and at 9:30 p.m. Wednesday night we left Paris for Rome. We were split up into parties of four and six, according to the size of the compartments in the cars. At Paris I met Miss Anderson, lady from Portland, Ore., joined her other American friends who were going to Rome, and found herself alone. She did not know a soul in the party. As she was sitting next to me I volunteered to see her through until she could join her own friends, who arrived in Rome next day after myself. I was a Canadian lady standing on the platform at Paris, and under the circumstances I think I was introducing myself as a fellow countryman and sailing but to join no American friend as a companion, which she willingly did as she was also alone. We then made up a party of four by inviting a London gentleman to join us, and settled down for our journey to Rome.

About daylight on Thursday we reached Chambery where the train stopped 20 minutes for coffee, so they call the light breakfast they serve us. We then entered the grand passes leading up to the Alps, and as soon as daylight appeared on Thursday, after passes under the Alps and connects France and Italy by rail. This tunnel is eight miles long and takes half an hour to pass through. The tunnel, as we climbed the passes to the top, was magnificent, the rugged peaks capped with snow on every side, with patches of cultivated land in all sorts and shapes and places away up the mountains, while on the border between France and Italy forts crowned some of the highest hills and appeared in the distance as if they reached into the very clouds. When we had passed to the lowest on the Italian side of the Alps we passed through miles and miles of beautiful hills and valleys.

We reached Turin at 2:30 p.m., Thursday, where all the party left the train and went into various hotels as no one hotel could accommodate so many. We had a great time chatting each other in the hotels and comparing our notes, etc., with those of our friends.

At Friday we were all up at 6 a.m., and on board the train at 7, when we left for Genoa.

We passed through a beautiful country, the old Province of Piedmont, where the Waldensian Protestants of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries were so terribly persecuted and driven up into the Wallesan Valley of the Alps, about 30 miles from Turin, where hundreds were pitched off the precipitous rocks and dashed to pieces on the rocks at the caves with fire and smoke where they would go for refuge. A mean to visit these spots on our way back to London.

About 11 o'clock a.m. we reached Genoa, and caught our first sight of the Mediterranean sea. We, from America, all gathered out of the train and walked the platform, as we could say we had been in the place where Columbus was born.

After, we left Genoa we began a journey the like of which I never wish to experience again. We passed through 90 tunnels before Genoa and a distance of about 80 miles. The heat and the smoke were terrible. We were almost sick and forgiven when we reached Pisa, and had great fun laughing at each other's black faces.

Pisa was the leading town of the train from the top of which Galileo conducted his experiments. We arrived in Rome at 10:45 p.m. Friday and found 600 Americans there already there, having sailed from Boston and New York direct to Naples by two steamers. They held meetings every day till the 20th, and have raised $9,000 in collections for missions, among themselves, before they landed at Naples.

In Rome every country had its own budge of blue silk with the name of the country to which the delegate belonged printed on the budge in gold letters, viz.: Canada, United States, Great Britain, Turkey, France, etc. These served as introductions to each other. Delegates would walk up to each other and take hold of his or her badge and say "Canada" or "United States," etc. "What part are you from?" "Oh, Montreal," "Vancouver," "Toronto," "Quebec," "Seattle," or if American, "New York," "San Francisco," and all pieces between. Everybody knew everyone else, and if they did not, they freely asked, and answered each other. Thereupon introductions were represented, and the greatest harmony and goodwill prevailed everywhere. On Sunday there was a great international communion service was held in the Methodist church on the 19th September. Bishop Hartzell, of Africa, presided, and at the end of the service called for a representative minister from each continent inside the pulpit railing, where they stood, Africa, Asia, Europe, America, Australia. Then he called all ministers from every land to the outside of the rail, and administered the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Thirty-nine countries and 56 denominations were represented in that service.

After these had retired, the ordinary delegates then went forward in companies of one hundred, and received the Sacrament. It was impressive beyond description. Telegrams conveying greetings and wishing every success to the movement were received from the King of Italy, and the Minister of Education. On the Saturday evening a grandchild of the famous Garibaldi, "Italy's King maker," was introduced to the delegates. The whole house sprang to its feet and cheered and cheered for Garibaldi and his grandaughter. The hall was a sea of waving handkerchiefs. She tried to speak but could only say a few words when the house was cheering again and again. This continued for fully ten minutes. After the meeting ended the people rushed to shake hands with her.

Now, as to Rome itself. It is a grand old city, and as beautiful now as any city in America. Since the city has come under the rule of King of Italy it has been completely transformed; it has been drained and cleaned, and has excellent water, the finest streets well lighted, and with a splendid electric car service all over the city. The city is well policed, and but for the great indecency of the men in the streets, which everywhere meets the eye, the behaviour of the general public is certainly better than in England. I have not seen a single drunken man here. This may be because the wine is so light and not because they are staunch abstainers. Words and Friends from every land throng the streets, and the Pope received 100 one day I was at the Vatican, and 125 the next day. These were from every land. The people here do not respect them at all. It is no credit to the tract men they receive in Montreal, where I lived so long. There everyone of the R. C. faith respected their priests, with perhaps an odd exception.

I spent two days going over St. Peter's church and the Vatican palaces and picture galleries. This church cost fifty million dollars to build and the beauty of the interior transcends the powers of description, so I will not attempt it. It will hold, they say, fifty thousand people. I was at one of the services while looking over it, and there is no question about its size and beauty of the robes of the priests and the surroundings, both vocal and instrumental, must make a deep impression even upon Protestants unless they know experimentally what they believe and why they believe what they do.

Some visitors annoyed me very much by constantly making disrespectful remarks concerning certain ceremonies and rites, which they considered foolish. I felt so deeply as anyone that the light we have in our present Bible study and what our R. C. friends have in their religion might not compare well candle light, yet I felt no good could be done, and much ill feeling raised by offending the feelings of those who differed with us in religious faith. I frankly told one man to shut up and away I go, but could not hold his tongue. Reasoning is not convincing, and ridicule another. Ridicule never enlightens.

In the Nestene Chapel I saw Michael Angelo's great painting of the Last Judgment. It is a magnificent painting, although somewhat marred with the touch of nearly 300 years. One strange feature of the picture is that of the way the great painter had his revenge on the Pope who had criticized the nude figures and asked the Pope to order Michael Angelo to drape the figures. When the picture was finished and the Pope and Cardinals came to view it, what was their awe? There sat Michael Angelo Buggia Cesaria who had criticized the work was painted and being down in hell with asses' ears protruding from his head. The Cardinal complained to the Pope, the story goes, asking him to have the nude picture to be removed, but the Pope replied that if he were in purgatory he could get him out, but he had no power to take him out of hell. You can see the picture quite plainly with the asses' ears standing out from the head, and it is the only figure so drawn, as there must be some reason why it was painted, and the only narrated story there is probably true.

I must close now, and will send you another letter when I get time, describing the ruins of ancient Rome and some spots where I have been in this wonderful city. Probably it will be ready by next week. I jumped out of the carriage and walked along the same road St. Paul walked on when he came to Rome.

Well, I must close my long letter, trusting it will interest your many readers.

I am, dear sir,
Yours truly,
ALBERT CLOSE.

CHAPTER XXXII.

As she finished speaking Eve did not lower her eyes. To her there was no suggestion of shame in her thoughts or in words, but to Loder, watching and listening, there was a perilous meaning contained in both.

"Thankfulness?" he repeated slowly. From his newly stirred sense of responsibility pity and sympathy were gradually rising. He had never seen Eve as he saw her now, and his vision was all the clearer for the long oblivion. With a poignant sense of compassion and remorse, the knowledge of her youth came to him—the youth that some women preserve in the midst of the world when circumstances have permitted them to see much, but to experience little.

"Thankfulness?" he said again incredulously.

A slight smile touched her lips. "Yes," she answered softly—"thankfulness that my trust had been rightly placed."

She spoke simply and confidently, but the truth struck Loder more sharply than any accusation. With a heavy sense of bitterness and renunciation he moved slowly forward.

"Eve," he said very gently, "you don't know what you say."

She had lowered her eyes as he came toward her. Now she lifted them in a swift upward glance. For the first time since he had entered the room a slight look of personal doubt and uneasiness showed in her face. "Why?" she said. "I—I don't understand."

For a moment he answered nothing. He had found his first explanation overwhelming. Now suddenly it seemed to him that his present difficulty was more impossible to surmount. "I came here tonight to tell you something," he began at last, "but so far I have only said half—"

"Half?"

"Yes, half." He repeated the word quickly, avoiding the question in her eyes. Then, conscious of the need for explanation, he plunged into rapid speech.

"A friend like mine," he said, "has only one safeguard, one justification—a boundless exactitude. Once shake that solidarity and the whole machine powercrumbles. It was to make the audacity impossible—to tell you the truth and make it impossible—that I came tonight. The fact that you already knew made the telling easier, but it altered nothing."

Eve raised her head, but he went resolutely on.

"Tonight," he said, "I have seen into my own life, into my own mind, and my ideas have been very roughly shaken into new places.

"We never make so colossal a mistake as when we imagine that we know ourselves. Months ago, when your husband first proposed this scheme to me, I was, according to my own conception, a solitary being vastly ill-used by fate, who, with a fine stoicism, was leading a clean life. That was what I believed, but there, at the very outset, I deceived myself. I was simply a man who shut himself away because he cherished a grudge against life and who lived honestly because he had a constitutional distaste for vice. My first feeling when I saw your husband was one of self-righteous contempt, and that has been my attitude all along. I have often marvelled at the flood of intolerance that has rushed over me at sight of him—the violent desire that has possessed me to look away from his weakness and banish the knowledge of it—but now I understand.

"I know now what the feeling meant. The knowledge came to me tonight. It meant that I turned away from his weakness because, deep within myself something stirred in recognition of it. Humanity is really much simpler than we like to think, and human impulses have an extraordinary fundamental resemblance. Weakness is egotism, but so is strength. Chilcote has followed his vice; I have followed my ambition. It will take a higher Judgment than yours or mine to say which of us has been the more selfish then." He paused and looked at her.

She was watchir; him intently. Some of the meaning in his face had found a pained, shamed reflection in her own. But the awe and wonder of the morning's discovery still colored the mirroring lens of her mind, which was vividly to allow of other considerations possessing their proper value. The thrill of exaltation with which the misgivings born of Chilcote's vice had drooped away from her mental image of Loder was still too absorbing to be easily dominated. She loved, and as if by a miracle her love had been justified! For the moment the justification was all sufficing. Something of confidence, something of the innocence that comes not from ignorance of evil, but from a mind singularly uncontaminated, blinded her to the danger of her position.

Loder, waiting apprehensively for some aid, some expression of opinion, became gradually conscious of this revelation in her. Moved by a fresh impulse, he crossed the small space that divided them and caught her hands.

"Eve," he said gently, "I have been trying to analyze myself and give you the reasons, but I shan't try any more. I shall be quite plain with you.

"From the first moment I took your husband's place I was ambitious. You unconsciously aroused the feeling when you brought me Fraide's message on the first night. You aroused it by your words, but more strongly, though more obscurely, by your underlying antagonism. On that night, though I did not know it, I took up my position; I made my determination. Do you know what that determination was?"

She shook her head.

"It was the desire to stamp out Chilcote's footmarks with my own, to prove that personality is the great force capable of everything. I forgot to reckon that when you drew largely upon Fate she generally extracts a crushing interest.

"First came the wish for your respect, then the desire to stand well with such men as Fraide—to feel the stir of emulation and competition—to prove myself strong in the one career I knew myself fitted for. For a time the second ambition overshadowed the first, but the first was bound to reassert itself, and in a moment of egotism I conceived the notion of winning your enthusiasm as well as your respect."

Eve's face, alert and questioning, suddenly paled as a doubt crossed her mind.

"Then it was only—only to stand well with me?"

"I believed it was only the desire to stand well with you. I believed it until the night of my speech—if you can credit anything so absurd. Then on that night, as I came up the stairs to the gallery and saw you standing there, the blindness fell away, and I knew that I loved you." As he said the last words he released her hands and turned aside, missing the quick wave of joy and color that crossed her face.

"I knew it, but it made no difference. I was only moved to a higher self-glorification. I touched supremacy that night. But as we drove home I experienced the strangest cohabitation of my life. You remember the block in the traffic at Piccadilly?"

Again Eve bent her head.

"Well, when I looked out of the carriage window to discover its cause the first man I saw was—Chilcote."

Eve started slightly. This swift, unexpected hinting of Chilcote's name with the most exalted moment of her life stirred her unpleasantly. Some lingering of Loder's intention in so linking it broke through the web of disturbed and conflicting thoughts.

"You gave him on that night?"

"Yes, and the sight chilled me. It was a big drop from supremacy to the remembrance of—everything."

Involuntarily she put out her hand.

But Loder shook his head. "No," he said; "don't pity me! The sight of him came just in time. I had a reaction in that moment, and, such as it was, I acted on it. I went to him next morning and told him that the thing must end. But then—even then—I shirked being honest with myself. I had meant to tell him that it must end because I had grown to love you, but my pride rose up and shut my tongue. I could not humiliate myself. I put the case before him in another light. It was a puzzle of wills, and I won, but the victory was not what it should have been. That was proved today when he returned to tell me of the hoax of this telegram. It wasn't the fear that Lady Astrupp had found it. It wasn't to save the position that I jumped at the chance of coming back. It was to feel the joy of living, the joy of seeing you, if only for a day!" Eve was conscious he turned toward her; then as abruptly he turned away again.

"I was still thinking of myself," he said. "I was still utterly self centered when I came to this room today and allowed you to talk to me, when I asked you to see me tonight as we parted at the club. I shan't tell you the thoughts that unconsciously were in my mind when I asked that favor. You must understand without explanation.

"I went to the theatre with Lady Astrupp ostensibly to find how the land lay in her direction—really to heighten my self-esteem. But there fate or the power we call by that name was lying in wait for me, ready to claim the first interest in the portion of life I had dared to borrow." He did not glance toward Eve as he had done in his previous pause. His whole manner seemed oppressed by the gravity of what he had still to say.

"I don't—I don't understand," she said. "I was still utterly self centered when I came to this room today and allowed you to talk to me, when I asked you to see me tonight as we parted at the club. The King Vs. George Farrington.

The prisoner, Geo. Farrington, was charged with committing, on the 30th day of May, A.D. 1907, at the Town of Napanee, in the County of Lennox and Addington, in and upon one Ethel Farrington, spinster, and her, the said Ethel Farrington, feloniously and ill-treated, thereby then occasioning to the said Ethel Farrington actual bodily harm, and other wrongs to the said Ethel Farrington having been done to the great damage of the said Ethel Farrington.

Mr. H. M. Deroche, K.C., appeared for the Crown.

Mr. D. H. Preston, K.C., appeared for the prisoner.

After the evidence was taken on behalf of the Crown and of the prisoner, His Honor Judge Madden then gave judgment as follows:

The prisoner is charged in the indictment with an assault on the person of Ethel, committed, on the 28th day of May, A.D. 1907, an assault upon Ethel Farrington, occasioning thereby actual bodily harm.

Under this indictment it is the duty of the Crown to establish by clear and positive evidence and satisfactory to me two things, 1st—That the assault was, on the day in question, actually committed on Ethel Farrington.

2d—That the result of that assault was to occasion actual bodily harm.

Under the Criminal Code an assault is defined to be "the intentional application of force directly or indirectly to another person and without the consent of that other person," and the assault as charged here, if the evidence in support of it, consists of a number of blows inflicted as punishment for some misbehaviour or misconduct—if misbehaviour or misconduct it can be called—and it is urged by Counsel on behalf of the prisoner that this whipping was used as a means of punishment for some act of disobedience on the child's part.

In considering the facts as disclosed in evidence here it is better probably to take up the second branch of the offence as charged, as it will probably throw some light, or tend to throw some light, upon the first branch, and will assist in arriving at a proper conclusion as to it.

Actual bodily harm may be defined to be such an injury as will interfere with the health and comfort of the individual, although it may not be of a permanent nature or endanger life.

The evidence established that the punishment or assault of the child here by the prisoner consisted of a number of severe blows on the little girl eyes with a strap, but according to the medical testimony, it must have been some harder instrument, or if a strap it must have been a very thick, hard piece of leather.

According to Dr. Simpson's evidence there were fourteen marks upon the person of Ethel Farrington, the evidence of Dr. Strathy is to the effect that there were also the Lindsay people corroborated that, as well as Chief Graham and the Police Magistrate. The marks upon the body were black and blue and would indicate that blows of a very severe nature had been inflicted, and in one or two instances they were so severe as if not inflicted, are likely to create an end in an abscess or something worse. They are not all absorbed now, although it is over a week since the whipping took place.

The child was heard screaming and complained of pains frequently in respect to these blows, and the child, although rather a bright little girl, does not seem to have thrown off altogether the effects of these blows since then. I think I am compelled under the evidence to find that the Crown has established the second branch of this indictment, that the result of the assault, under the guise of a whipping, was to occasion actual bodily harm.

As to the question of assault, the evidence shows and Counsel for the prisoner admits that the little girl was guilty of two or three acts of disobedience. It is necessary to consider whether the exercise of justification set up as a defence in this case is well founded.

Under the law a parent, or person who is in position of parent, or school master is entitled to use force as a means of correction, providing such force is reasonable under the circumstances.

In determining this second point, or second branch of the inquiry, it is necessary to consider not only the severity of the whipping, but also the act of disobedience, which is given as the ground for the punishment.

It was suggested in cross-examination that the little girl had been guilty of breaking a stick and of picking rhubarb. I think the evidence of the little girl goes to show that she didn't pick the rhubarb but her little brother did, and on the strength of the prisoner's instructions or orders being disobeyed he undertakes to chastise the little girl for having done so.

In considering the question of whether the punishment was reasonable or not, it does seem to me that the law has to do to look at the prisoner and look at the little girl. The prisoner is a strong vigorous man, the child seven or less than seven years old, and in my judgment almost incapable of inflicting any punishment upon the object of correction. She is able to do some household duties, I think, such as using a broom handle or even a heavy strap or cane a child of this kind seems to me unreasonable. I cannot think that in the ordinary course could or at little innocent child—almost a tot struggling to get around the house—and beat her as this child was beaten for any such act of disobedience as pulling a little rhubarb, which one little child is apt to do at this time of the year.

I think the evidence compels me to find that the act of whipping was wholly unwarranted and it was most brutal, and that the first branch of the indictment has been established by the Crown, and this, taken with my first finding, makes the proof of the indictment complete, and I think I will not do anything else except find the prisoner guilty of the charge.

Mr. Deroche, K.C., presents a certified copy of conviction of the prisoner at the General Sessions of the Peace in and for the County of Lennox and Addington, Ontario on the 11th day of June, 1904, when he was found guilty of an assault committed with his ward, and sentenced to 18 months in the Central Prison.

Mr. Preston, K.C., submits that this certificate should not be received, as it is no way connected to this offence and was a crime in no way similar to that of which he is now charged.

His Honor Judge Madden allowed the certified copy of previous conviction to be put in evidence.

The Sentence—The facts in this case are most revolting and unnatural, and it is unfortunate that a father should brutally illtreat and abuse a little child like Ethel Farrington, as the evidence shows here today. There is only one explanation of it as far as I can see, that you are a barbarian at heart. To my mind that means nothing else, and I think there is not one redeeming feature in this whole case in your favor. Dr. Cowan, your own witness, characterizes you as a "brutal man and one who is capable of taking acts of cruelty." This previous conviction stands against you, your record is bad, and it appears to me that you are a man who ought not to be allowed in society—in decent society. If you had chosen you had an opportunity, when these people were all interested in your behalf, from your Counsel to the Chief-of-Police, to have your children placed where they could be properly cared for, but that did not suit your purpose.

It does seem to me that the Crown has been very lenient with you in laying the charge they did, the facts would almost warrant a severer charge than has been laid against you.

I think you should be imprisoned, as I think this case is most brutal. If you had such a liking for your children as your Counsel submits, you would have kept the admirability of putting them when the Chief of Police wanted them put until you were able to take them home in a proper manner, but you do not seem to want to do that, but went on beating this poor little girl and it is very fortunate for you that blood poisoning did not set in.

The sentence of the Court upon you, Geo. Farrington, is that you be imprisoned in the Provincial Penitentiary at Kingston for three years with hard labor.

I am very sorry the law does not allow me to take a severer view than I might be interested in the same way that you treated this poor little girl."

WOMEN PAY MORE.

WHY INSURANCE COMPANIES DISCRIMINATE AGAINST THE GENTLE SEX.

If one is to believe the medical examiners the reason a woman pays more for the privilege of life insurance is that she is much more subject to monly a victim of indigestion and stomach troubles and the fatal ailments that spring from these causes.

It is not the acute attacks of disease that the insurance examiners alone, but the constant feelings of weakness, headache, indigestion and stomach trouble. These things, physicians say, kill more people than many of the serious diseases.

For curative power in all stomach troubles nothing else can hold a candle to Mi-o-na. It is unlike any remedy heretofore known; it is a combined digestive tonic that strengthens and restores to natural action the stomach and bowels and makes a complete cure in even the worse form of stomach troubles.

Mi-o-na is sold by druggists in 50-cent boxes under a guarantee to refund the money unless it does all that is claimed for it.

THE ROBINSON CO. LIMITED — IS — Napanee's Greatest Store — THE ROBINSON CO. LIMITED

You Are Invited to See Our Store
Decorated With Laces, Saturday, June 15th,
And Next Week.

Laces play such an important part in the trimming of dresses, that our main interior displays for Saturday and next week will be lace. We carry a stock of Laces that amounts in value equal to the whole stock of some retail stores. Our buyers are so closely in touch with garment making styles that each piece we show is a seller. With very few exceptions every piece we have is our own direct importation. It is depended on middlemen for supplies our prices for equal qualities would need to be increased. We have every piece of lace sampled in book form, making it very convenient to select from. At hour of writing we have FOUR HUNDRED AND SIXTY-TWO SAMPLES to choose from. Every price tickets will tell the value story. The prices you will see are our regular values; real Lace worth that we will give you or yours, any and every day you may come. That's the test of our Lace stock.

Another Electrical Display, Saturday Night, June 15. This Time With Laces

Buy Hair at Auction?

At any rate, you seem to be getting rid of it on auction-sale principles: "going, going, g-o-n-e!" Stop the auction with Ayer's Hair Vigor. It certainly checks falling hair; no mistake about this. It acts as a regular medicine; makes the scalp healthy. Then you must have healthy hair, for it's nature's way.

GET YOUR PRESCRIPTIONS FILLED AT WALLACE'S.

AN OPTIMISTIC FARMER.

Regina, Sask., May 29.—"The crop prospects are the second on a better level bed in all my experience of the country," said R. F. Marshall, one of the most successful farmers of Regina district this morning. He farms within a mile or two of the city limits, and is noted for the quality of his wheat.

"I have completed wheat seeding a fortnight ago, and we shall have it in a couple days at the end of this week. Yesterday's rain brought the moisture on wonderfully and I have no doubt the crop looking better at the end of May. Every indication points to the heaviest average yield in the history of the district and I consider we are anything like so good shots at the actual production of the province should be much in excess of last year's yield."—Winnipeg Free Press.

THE OLD MAN WITH THE OLD POLICY.

You please will doubtless be remember, as an enterprising city, a federal election not many years ago. In our case it is unnecessary to say that "the well known drug store is the well known policy," "quality first," "you get it at The Medical Hall" is good. Fred. L. Hooper.

FAME IS EVANESCENT

MAN'S GREATEST SERVICES ARE SOON FORGOTTEN.

LESSONS FROM LIFE OF JOSEPH

Worldly Repute Is But Passing—Posterity Has a Short Memory—Evil is Remembered, Good Forgotten—Moral Worth Should Be Striven After—This Alone Secures a Record in Book of Remembrance.

Entered according to Act of Parliament of Canada, in the year 1907, by Fleming Lewis, at the Department of Agriculture, Ottawa.

Los Angeles, Cal., June 9.—That worldly fame is a fleeting vapor is apparent and that even the greatest services one can render to his fellow men are apt soon to be forgotten is the lesson of this sermon. The text is Exodus 1:8, "Now there arose up a new king over Egypt which knew not Joseph."

If there is any country which preeminently built its monuments to endure as long as the hills remain that land is ancient Egypt. When the Egyptians planned a monument to commemorate a victory or the glories of their kings or national heroes they never failed to say, "We will erect this monument out of such massive stones that the foundations of the earth shall have to be moved before it can be overlooked down." These graves, like those of the "tombs of the kings," were excavated from the sides of the mountains themselves. To break them down for hundreds and hundreds of years the earth and tear down the foundations of the hills and destroy the unbroken rocks which have never been disturbed since the Divine Mason mortared them in at their layings. Yet there is a strange irony in the fact that, although the monuments remain, the memory of the men they were intended to immortalize has perished. Except in an only guess at the purpose for which some of those monuments were raised. The modern Egyptian cannot tell you the meaning of the Sphinx; he cannot tell you why the pyramids were built, and he has to ask the modern German or Frenchman or Englishman what is the meaning of the inscriptions on the walls. The great pharaohs of the dim past are completely forgotten by the people of the country over which they ruled.

If Egypt—old Egypt—could forget the purpose for which the pyramids were built, if it could forget where was the "valley of the west" in which the kings of the eighteenth dynasty were buried, if it could forget the site of some of its greatest and most populous cities, surely it is not wonderful to learn that there arose a king and a people in old Egypt who could forget that a great prime minister like Joseph ever lived. There had been a time when his name was in every mouth, when his power and authority had been felt from one end of the country to the other, but he, like the pharaohs, was forgotten. So it is in modern times. The man who occupied so large a space in the newspapers, who were followed by crowds of admirers, on whose lips great audiences hung enraptured, are scarcely mentioned now. They have passed into history, and the world goes on without them. The fact teaches a lesson that all of us should learn. Let us do faithfully the work God has given us to do and make our energies in building sand castles on the beach of time which will not immortalize us, but will be swept away by the waves of oblivion.

The name of Joseph was forgotten by the Egyptians because, in the first place, the conditions which made him prime minister of Pharaoh's kingdom had forever passed away. For seven years of famine were gone. The great granaries in which the product of the seven years of plenty were stored had been emptied and pulled down. The recollections of those seven months when the great river Nile refused to overflow its banks, had grown dimmer and dimmer. The famine and the cattle and the sheep and the oxen and the oxen and the women and the children were no longer in danger of starvation. Thus the conditions which made Joseph's fame the most potent in all Egypt had gone and been forgotten, and the great prime minister's name had been forgotten as well. When a man's work is done the man as far as the world is concerned ceases to exist. The world does not enjoy picnicking in a graveyard nor associating with the dead. It has hard enough work to keep up with the living issues without encumbering the load of its mummied past.

I come to you today and say, "Tell me the history of the great American political parties. What did the Federalists stand for? What was the great bond which held together the Democratic-Republican party, with Thomas Jefferson at its head? What was the leading issue which made James K. Polk president of the United States? Upon what ground was Texas admitted into the Union?" "Oh," you answer, "I do not know! I have never studied those causes. Those causes are dead issues. I have no interest and time to keep up with the platforms of our present political parties. I say, as do most men, 'Let the dead bury their dead.'"

I ask you another question, "Who built the Erie canal?" Of course you know that the Erie canal was the most famous piece of engineering ever undertaken in the United States up to that time. What was the history of the "pony express," one of the most daring mercantile enterprises ever started and which once connected the Californias with the eastern metropolis. Your answer: "I do not know, and since the mighty locomotive, with its flaming red nostrils, has spanned this continent I am more anxious to study the future of our modern transportation systems than to find out the genesis of our Erie canal or pony express. When the stage coach and the canalboat have become the relics of a defunct past I say, 'Let the dead bury their dead.'" That is true of the sociological and scientific world is also true of the domestic and the ecclesiastical.

When an issue which has made a man famous passes away the man's fame is done and the man's name will surely be forgotten.

But there is another reason why these Egyptians ceased to honor the name of Joseph. The disasters which followed the slay of his people in Egypt were so overwhelming that Joseph's services were forgotten. They would not mention his name unless at the same time they recalled the calamities which disasters had brought upon their kingdom. These Hebrews who were the descendants of Joseph and his brethren were like a small tribe of Indians called the Aztecs, which overran Mexico. They multiplied rapidly in numbers until they overran and devoured the whole land of what is now called modern Mexico. So was it with the children of Israel in Egypt. They were multiplying so fast that they threatened to overturn the throne of the pharaohs.

"Joseph? Who was Joseph?" I hear some of the Egyptians ask. "Oh, I know," some one answers. "He is that Hebrew who was captured by a band of roving Ishmaelites and brought into this country and sold as a slave about 200 years ago, under one of the shepherd kings called Apophis. That the story goes that he interpreted some crazy dream of the king and was appointed prime minister. Then he sent to his old home fo Canaan and brought down all his brothers and their wives and children. And their descendants multiplied until they have become as numerous as the Hebrews we have with us to-day." "What! Did all the children of Israel come into Joseph's family?" "Yes, all, all." Then I hear the Egyptian utter, "Curse him! Curse him! Curse him!" Then the Egyptians forgot all about Joseph, because they forgot how Joseph had saved their ancestors from starvation. They forgot somewhat the fact that the multitudes of threatening slaves at their feet were the descendants of this same prime minister and his relations.

Alas, my friends, it is not a fact that the evil we do will live longer in men's minds than the good we do? Why, no! Not at all. Though we may have spent a whole lifetime in good works, yet if we do one wrong deed one wrong will be chiseled by man in the solid rock of memory, while the good we do will be forgotten in a day.

Who was Solomon Spaulding? "Spaulding, Spaulding?" you say. "Was it not Solomon Spaulding who lived in Pittsburg? Was he not the man who in 1810 wrote a book to prove that the North American Indians were the descendants of the lost ten tribes of Israel?" And was it not this book that Joseph Smith took and afterward called the Book of Mormon, and thereby afterward founded the Mormon church?" Yes, Solomon Spaulding was that man. Is that all you know about him? Well, as far as I can make out, Solomon Spaulding was the only thing he ever did that I are trying to live. He was an honest man. He was good to his family. He tried to be of help to mankind. But in his old age, to pass the tedious hours of loneliness, he wrote this book which the charlatan, Joseph Smith, got hold of. And to-day all the good that Solomon Spaulding ever did has been forgotten. But the one mistake he made will live long after the centuries. And so, my friends, if you and I are living simply for the fame which we shall have among those who come after us there are a thousand chances to one that we shall be best remembered by the mistakes we have made rather than praised for the good we have done. Joseph, the prime minister who saved Egypt from starvation, was forgotten, but Joseph the ancestor of the Hebrew slaves was remembered. "And there arose up a new king over Egypt which knew not Joseph."

But there was still another reason why the Egyptians ceased to honor the name of Joseph. As a dishonest people ruled by dishonest officials, they did not want to revere the memory of one whose public and private life was pure and spotless and who, through a long premiership, demanded that the Egyptian people should be honest and pure as he was honest and pure. Why, you might as well expect a band of highwaymen and robbers to elect Paul or Jesus for their captain as to expect the dishonest, merciless Egyptians to like a Joseph. What he stood for they did not. They be preached was against every desire of their corrupt hearts.

In the first place, Joseph was a pure man in his moral life. He believed that marriage was more than a mere name and a form by which a man or a woman could hide a multitude of sins. He did not believe that as soon as married men or married women became tired of their married partners they had a right to turn their backs upon each other as one might throw away a bouquet of withered flowers in order to seek some new wild flowers. Neither did he believe in the pernicious, immoral and damning doctrine that a young man, because he was a man, had a right to sow his wild oats wherever he would before his marriage and then on his wedding day swear fidelity to a pure girl and let the filthy buzzard and the spotless dove be yoked together in the same nest. If you do not believe that, read your Bible and read the Bible account of Joseph's life in the house of Potiphar. His master trusted him, and Joseph was true to Potiphar's care all that he had. He said to the young man, "Joseph, there is my money, my family and my home or. Protect them. I trust you." And rather than betray his trust, Joseph, with sealed lips, went to poverty and to prison. Oh, ye pure liberties of high life; oh, ye honored and wanton debauchees, legalizing your crimes in a divorce court, come hither and sit at the feet of this young man of the land of Egypt and learn from Joseph's sight, as in God's sight, the marriage altar is the most sacred spot in the universe, next to the great white throne.

But Joseph was more than morally pure. He was financially clean as well. No blinded money clouds in the palms of his hands. There is many a man who is morally pure in his home and good to his family who is a thief and a robber and who will cheat every one he can from a financial way. "Boss" Tweed, the biggest political thief New York city ever produced, was a pious member of the Presbyterian church and dive keeper of New York, a man who made millions of dollars out of the dens of infamy and who spent some years in the penitentiary, loved his family with a passionate love. Yes, Joseph was politically clean as well as morally pure When he gathered up the tenth part of all the grain of Egypt during the seven years of plenty he stored it all in the public granaries. And when the seven years of want came he sold it all back to the people. Not one dishonest coin stuck to his fingers. Thus, because he was honest and made his deputies honest, the dishonest officials hated him and tried to forget his existence. And one of the best signs that you are pure and true and honest and upright and good is that dishonest people and impure people try to forget your name and push you into oblivion.

You have all heard the story of the great general and statesman Aristides the Just. Tighter and tighter was he gripping the hearts of the Athenian people. Themistocles, his great rival, realized that in a little while, if Aristides was allowed to associate with the people, his influence would become so great that no voice would have any power in Athens but his. So Themistocles gathered all the rough and bad elements together and started a movement to banish Aristides from the city. On the day of the election a peasant approached Aristides and asked his help in voting against Aristides. "Why, what damage has he done?" Aristides asked. "Has he done any wrong that you would drive him from this capital?" "No," answered the peasant, not that I know of. I do not even know him, but it irritates me to hear him everywhere called the 'Just.'" And so the carrion birds would, if they could, always drive the clean winged birds from the heavens. The dishonest Egyptians would obliterate the name of Joseph, the prime minister, from the list of their national heroes. And, my brother, if the dissolute do not despise you and the unjust hate you, and the evil minded want to forget you, then you should examine your heart and, life, fearing lest you are grieving the Holy Ghost. A surest sign on earth that you are living a good, pure life is that bad people want you out of their sight. "Now there arose up a new king over Egypt which knew not Joseph."

But, lastly, I remark that the Egyptians ceased to revere Joseph's memory because they did not believe that the God who sent Joseph to save them in the time of famine lived to still punish them. And yet is not the Egyptians' error one which for ages and years has been sending to us our Josephs, after he has showered immortelles upon us, are we not apt to say: "God is good," "God is kind and forgiving," "God is loving, and he will never send the rolling surges of his Red sea of judgment tumbling down upon us for our long suffering mercy of God! How long, O God, how long will those avenging hand from us? How long shall we cease to forget that love can trample upon thy goodness? Some time ago there came into my possession a wonderful picture. It was one of Dore's masterpieces.

The scene was the Roman coliseum. It was night. A thousand spectators sat of seats, capable of holding 100,000 spectators, were the decorations? There you could see them in dim outline. As you looked at them you could see in imagination those seats again filled with the yelling, vociferant multitudes who thronged the long, long, but just passed had watched the gladiatorial contests and the murdering of the Christians. But, though those tiers of seats were empty, the arena was not. That arena was filled with great piles of human corpses. There were mothers there, even in death hugging their dead babies to their breasts. There were strong limbed men there and old men and old women. But they were dead—all dead. And among the silent corpses you could see the hungry lions creeping or crouching. But over all this scene of death Dore has let a light hover, and through that light can be seen God's angels. With one hand he is beckoning the dead—aye, blessing the bodies of the dead, whose spirits were then with God. But as I am watching that powerful, wondrous picture I kept saying to myself, "God may bless his dead. God may redeem his dead. But God's avenging hand will surely strike those who will persist in striking him. Bloody Nero, if you think God would strike him then when thou didst strike him? Pharaoh, who said not Joseph, didst thou dream that Moses would yet come to desolate thy kingdom?"

Sir Thomas Lipton, the famous tea merchant, has announced that he will leave his fortune to charity. Sir Thomas is a bachelor and has no relatives. He is worth $10,000,000. Sir Thomas is a self-made man and has made his money in the tea business. He is a generous man and has given away large sums to charity. He is a great sportsman and has spent a great deal of money in trying to win the America cup. He has been unsuccessful in his attempts to win the cup, but he has made a good sportsman and has taken his defeats in a manly way. "Why not?"

"Well, he has been in several families, you know, and has learned a lot of queer habits that don't jibe. When you give him his food, he always asks a blessing over it, but he swears at it while he's eating it."

BRONCHIAL TROUBLES.
READILY YIELD TO SOOTHING, HEALING TREATMENT OF HYOMEI.
Bronchial troubles are purely local. They cannot be helped by stomach dosing. They are caused by irritation in the air passages and can be relieved and cured by medicated air alone. In this lies the secret of the great success of Hy-o-mei in the treatment of bronchial troubles.
The first breath of Hy-o-mei's medicated air soothes the inflammation, stops the cough, and relief soon becomes permanent. A few minutes' use of Hy-o-mei has made many remarkable cures in the worst and most chronic forms of bronchial troubles and it is sold by Mr. T. B. Wallace with the same guarantee as for every other Hy-o-mei is purchased for catarrh, that no article is ever put on sale unless it does what is claimed for it. A MOTHER'S GRATITUDE.

Mrs. X. Cheoret, of St. Benoit, Que., writes as follows: "It is with feelings of the deepest gratitude that I write to tell you what Baby's Own Tablets have done for my baby. When I began giving him the Tablets he was so thin and wasted that he looked like a skeleton. His digestion was poor; he was constipated and cried day and night. I got a box of Baby's Own Tablets and found the first they did him a great deal of good. His food digested better; his bowels worked regularly; his sleep was natural; he stopped crying and began to grow fat. I got another box and am happy to say before they were all used he was in perfect health and is now a plump rugged child. I always keep a box of Tablets in the house and would advise other mothers to do the same." The above is a fair sample of letters that come to us from all parts of Canada praising Baby's Own Tablets. The Tablets cure all the minor ills of babies and young children, and are absolutely safe, as they do not contain one particle of opiate or narcotic. Sold by medicine dealers or by mail at 25 cents a box from The Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

CONCERNING BLACK BASS.

(From The Canadian Courier.)

We found the high water the worst enemy to our sport. The bass are then able to feed far back from the regular channels and the fisherman cannot follow them. We have noted that this fish feeds early in the morning and after mid-afternoon, but I have never seen them feed more greedily than in July and August at night, when the moon is almost at the full. Then they can see their most longed for food, the minnows, swimming between them and the surface. Often minnow, bass and all, will come out in one great splurge of water. Undoubtedly the best time to fish for the small-mouth is in October, on the rocky points and bars, then, if one is not shot by some gentle-eyed duck-hunter, he will have royal sport indeed.

Fish for them, if possible, in swift water, for it is harder and has better and the fish more difficult to handle, and pray join the last increasing throng of clean-minded, honest sportsmen, that gently release all the small fish and every large one above the immediate needs of the party. It is scandalous that any fisherman, United States or Canadian, should catch these sporty black bass and then feed them to the hog. Often all that are wanted, then continue if unable to resist, but let the unneeded ones go uninjured.

SUNDAY CHEESE MAKING.

Bowmanville,, Ont., June 7.—The Rev. T. Albert Moore, provincial secretary of the Lord's Day Alliance, in addressing the Bay of Quinte Methodist Conference to-day, stated that on the authority of the Attorney-General of Ontario, all persons found making cheese on Sunday would be brought before the courts to answer for violation of the Lord's Day Act. The Government had decided to let the prosecution of such cases proceed.

When Mr. Moore had concluded his remarks, Mr. C. W. Colville, a large farmer, of Lennox, who is attending the conference as a layman, sprang to his feet and opened a battery of verbal opposition to some of the utterances of the Alliance. He asked Mr. Moore if it were true that under the new act railways could start their trains on Saturday night and run them into Sunday. "Yes," he continued, "and I know of lots of trains run to their destination, even on Sunday, and yet cheesemakers throughout Ontario, who have large quantities of milk in factories waiting for treatment, cannot continue for two or three hours on Sunday, that work they began Saturday night."

Mr. Moore answered that this by saying he was not responsible for the law, but that the Dominion Parliament had made such legislation.

"Well then, some of those laws are most unreasonable," said Mr. Neville. "I am a practical dairyman, and know that the dairymen of Lennox and Addington are not all in the position of being able to keep milk over Sunday. You ask us to pay salaries and give to missionary funds and yet you make laws by which farmers must lose from 85 to $10 a day. The fault is that these laws are often made by enthusiasts, who are not practical men, and know nothing about what they legislate against."

Mr. Moore again replied that Parliament was responsible for the law prohibiting cheese-making on the Lord's day, and that experts had explained to Parliament that it was not necessary to continue the work in such factories into Sunday. A brief lively debate ensued, in which Mr. H. K. Daniels, exwarden of Hastings; Mr. J. L. Squire, of Norwood, and other dairymen took part.

WISE AND OTHERWISE.

"So they were divorced and lived happily ever after, eh?" "Nah! The idiots went and married again."

Dr. J. D. Kellogg's Dysentery Cordial is prepared from the juices of the pods of Colombo as thoroughly soluble for the cure of cholera, dysentery, diarrhœa, and bowel complaints as quinine is for fever and ague. It has been successfully by medical practitioners for a number of years with gratifying results. If suffering from any summer complaint it is folly to experimise that will cure you. Try a bottle. It sells for 25 cents.

"Don't be ashamed to go around begging," said the pompous old gentleman. "Even kings make people work for a world," rejoined the boy. "Have you ever proved it boy as I'm too proud to work."

The healthy glow disappearing from the cheeks and moaning and restlessness at night are sure symptoms of worms in children. Do not fail to get a bottle of Mother Graves' Worm Exterminator; it is an effectual medicine.

"Mulrooney, and we like a little drink w' Thanks, Casey. I will."
"So will I."
Then the bottle began.

Are your eyes harder to remove than the dust? Most others have had to. Have they not cured by using Murine? Then Cure? Try a bottle.

"What a wild goose chase I've had!" exclaimed Mr. Brazen. "I've been looking for you everywhere."
And then he couldn't understand why she was offended.

IT IS GOOD FOR MAN AND BEAST.—Not only is Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil of incomparable value in the household, but the farmer and stockman will find it very serviceable in many ways. For the cure of distemper, colics saving the services of a veterinary surgeon. Directions to stock and to the human family and pains it can be used with good effect.

"Be keerful o' them city ways," said the old man to his son, who was leaving home, "but if you've got to git run over git run by a horse. Them automobiles that kin afford to pay you damages enough to buy a gasoline eat help me take the mortgage off the mule. Don't let no city chap kiss Emmie out, nor say telegraph pole fall on you, 'cos in for big things or little ones you air in the way of 'em!"

BLOOD CLEANSE THE SYSTEM THOROUGHLY.—Parmelee's Vegetable Pills cleanse the stomach and bowels, and thoroughly cause the excretory vessels to throw off the impurities of the blood. They also regulate and expel the deleterious mass from the body through the skin, thereby conveying moisture to the patient, who speedily realizes their effect. They have strong recommendations from all those who have used them, and are free from calomel.

Judge—If you knew you were innocent why did you give a false name?
Prisoner—I was afraid of compromising too many people.
Judge—Discharged. And what's your real name?
Prisoner—John Smith.

THEY ADVERTISE THEMSELVES.—Indigestion and biliousness are the public Parmelee's Vegetable Pills became popular because of the good results obtained by themselves. That reputation has grown, and they now stand as the first medicine in use in attacks of dyspepsia and biliousness, constipation of the bowels, and chronic rheumatism, fever and ague and the innumerable complications to which these ailments give rise.

"Money doesn't always bring happiness and peace of mind."
"You're right there," answered the man with the hundred jobs. "Sometimes it tempts you to buy automobiles.

"Why, Harold! What did you say was wrong with your pencil?"
"It's busted."
"Dear me! Children, can any of you tell what Harold means? Is there any one who can help the boy?"
Up went the hand of little Marjorie.
"Well, Marjorie, what do you would know. What does Harold mean?"
"He means that his pencil is both butted."

CLIFFORD—O'ROURKE.

St. Lioas' church, Bath, was the scene of a very pretty wedding, when Miss Annie E. Rorford, 18th, and R. J. O'Rourke, Kingston, were united in matrimony, on Monday, June 3d. The popular bride looked charming in a cream silk eolienne with satin trimmings and picture hat. She was attended by Miss Jo. Cumingham, Bath, while J. Clifford, Picton, was best man. After the ceremony the party sat down to a sumptuous breakfast. Only immediate relatives were present. The happy couple left for Toronto. The bride's travelling gown was grey broadcloth with white silk blouse and hat to match.

CHALMERS—ROBLIN.

A quiet wedding took place at the home of Mrs. Martha Chalmers, Parma, Wednesday, June 5th, when her eldest daughter, Jessie E., was united in marriage to Mr. Fred. B. Roblin, of Adolphustown. The ceremony was performed by Rev. Canon Roberts, under an arch of evergreens and flowers. The bride, who was daintily gowned in white Persian lawn, was given away by her eldest brother, Silas Chalmers, a shower bouquet of white carnations. She was attended by her sister, Miss Gertrude, who wore white muslin over satin blue and carried pink carnations. Mr. Ernest Roblin, of Westerton, brother of the groom, acted as best man. The groom's present to the bride was a cushion of pearls, and to the bridesmaid a pearl and amethyst brooch. Luncheon was served at the close of the ceremony, after which Mr. and Mrs. Roblin left on the 2.40 train for Smith's Falls, amidst a shower of rice and good wishes. The bride's travelling suit was a dark grey cloth. Many presents were received by the bride, which showed the high esteem in which she is held by her many friends.

MRS. MARTHA MCKNIGHT.

Wife of Hugh McKnight, died, after suffering several months illness from paralysis, sustained a fall fracturing a limb, and since then was quite helpless, until death on May 13th, was a happy release. She was patient under all her suffering, ever looking up to God, knowing "He doth all things well." She was a most affectionate and unselfish wife and mother. She was a life-long Methodist, and highly respected by all who knew her. Deceased leaves a devoted and kind husband and five faithful children, all of whom are married but the youngest son, Arthur, to mourn the loss of a most devout and loving mother, one son having died eleven years ago. The late Mrs. McKnight was 73 years of age, and for the last year has been a resident of Mount Pleasant, where she made many friends. Indeed the untiring attentions and kindnesses of the neighbors and friends will always remain fresh in the memories of the surviving family, and were fully appreciated by the one that is gone. The funeral service was conducted by the Rev. Dudley, and the remains were interred in the family plot at Redhills.

HISTORICAL.

A well attended meeting of the Lennox and Addington Historical Society was held at the Public Library building on Thursday evening, June 13th.

The Constitution recommended by the Executive Committee, was, with a few amendments, confirmed by the society. The annual dues were fixed at one dollar for annual members, one dollar and a half for family members, and two dollars for juvenile members, and fifteen dollars for life members.

Twenty-six of those present joined the society. A short fifteen others have signified their intention to become members, and as the constitution provides that all clergymen and teachers resident in the county shall be ex-officio members, it would seem that the success of the movement is assured.

The President reported the progress which has been made toward the completion of the permanent home of the Association, and spoke briefly of recent accession.

After the general business had been transacted Mr. Frederick Burrows gave a very interesting address on his early experiences as Inspector of Schools for the County of Lennox and Addington.

Mr. Burrows will write a paper for the Society covering the subject upon which he spoke, and this paper will be included in the first volume of records and papers issued by the Society.

The meeting adjourned at 9.30 p.m.

CHAMBERS.

Crops look very fine in this locality, although the backward spring has been a great hindrance to everything.

Our little community was shocked on Monday, 3d June, to hear of the death of Mrs. Frank Sagar. Deceased had been in poor health for some time with lung trouble, but nothing that kind and loving hands could do to relieve the poor sufferer was done, but the peaceful end came on Monday afternoon. She was highly respected by all, having lived in this neighborhood all her life time. She was the daughter of Mr. Curl, who lives but a short distance from her home. She leaves a sorrowing husband and little daughter Gladys, of three years, besides a mother, father, two sisters and two brothers, namely, Mrs. Lillian Hamby, Miss Bertha, Mr. Arthur and Mr. Wilbert. Mrs. Hambly having come from Toronto hospital to attend the funeral. To the sorrowing ones will be extended our most heartfelt sympathy in their hour of trouble. The funeral service was conducted at the White church, Morven, on Wednesday afternoon, by the Rev. Mr. Horton. Many friends gathered to pay their last respects to a dear friend, whom they respected so highly.

One more home call, dear darling Emma,
For we on earth must mourn for you;
While songs of joy our lips employ,
One long, last farewell.

THE DAY-LIGHT STORE.

The People's Popular Trading Place.

The question of stores coming and going and the length of time in business is a topic of the past. What the people want to-day is a store that shares values with the people. This is done at this store. We buy for cash and at present our buying powers would surprise you. What is money? Money is coming in so freely these days that we thought perhaps the people would like to know just what money really is that everybody is striving for so fiercely, and what it's good for, besides getting bargains at Madill's, so we borrowed a big pair of shears and clipped the following:

To be query, "What is money anyway?" the following answers are made:

Money is the loudest sound in the voice of life.

The most effective substitute for brains.

A provider for everything but happiness; a passport to everywhere but heaven.

Something that always gets the glad hand.

Money is the most difficult road to cultivate.

The best talking machine.

That which women look for while men sleep.

A curse to some that have it and a curse to all haven't.

What the rich don't need and the poor don't get.

The breath of business.

The antidote for poverty.

That which speaks a language we can all understand, but in which few are able to converse—selected.

When we started in we had no intentions of quoting an item about the "good things" in our store, but the habit is too strong. It's about the remarkable offerings we give every Saturday so all may share alike.

READY-TO-WEAR SECTION.

A talk on Women's fine Tailored Coats and Skirts. Not so much a talk, perhaps, as it is an urgement in favor of your at least looking at our coat and skirt offering before you finally decide. We think our coat and skirt styles equal to the smartest of New York's fashionable offerings. Ryan's Stores

There is so much we want to tell you about this week that we are taking a full column instead of the usual space, and if this talk properly represents our stand this column will be full of news of genuine interest to many readers. The season has been cold and backward and in many lines there are large stocks that must be cleared out quickly to make room for new imports which have already been or here and will soon be shipped in

At last the warm weather has come and with it the demand for summer goods, more especially dress goods. Let us tell you something about what we have and then come and see for yourself what splendid offerings we are making.

Ladies' Summer Dress Goods

We have never been in such good position to meet every want in this line. The cold spring had a tendency to make trade slow but now these goods must go with a rush. Among them we might mention

Persian Lawns, India Linens, Costume Linens

White and cream and Batiste, that new goods which is almost as soft and fine as silk and makes up such stylish shirt waists. If you are not already familiar with the qualities of Batiste let us show you how fair it surpasses anything in the line of summer waisting.

Dress Trimmings

You may be surprised at the complete line of trimmings we carry, such as Valenciennes Laces, Insertions and Insertions.

Summer Waists

If you prefer to buy your waists ready to wear you will find here a splendid opportunity to select exactly what you want, at prices ranging from 50cts to $3.00.

Summer Suits

A complete line. Beautifully made up in the latest designs and in variety to meet your taste. Prices $5 up to $18.00.

Shirts Ready-to-Wear

They come in black, grey and blue. For real warm weather there are some light greys which are particularly stylish looking and are attracting special attention. $2.00 to $5.00.

Long Gloves

Sleeves are made short this season and a wonderfully dressy effect is obtained by the wearing of long gloves. We have beautiful silk gloves in greys, black and white. Elbow lengths are popular.

Men's Clothing

While we are giving special attention this week to women's goods, we must not forget the men, for this store has long stood for what is best in men's clothing. There are good fitting, up-to-date suits here that would cost nearly twice as much at a custom tailor's and besides you have the advantage of seeing just how the suit will look before you buy.

Because of the reputation of our men's clothing department, we have seen come twenty to thirty miles to be fitted and some have been coming back for the last thirty years. Prices run from $15 to $22.50.

Men's Shirts

In both soft and starched fronts. All the best brands and most up-to-date goods at from 50cts to $1.00.

But we cannot begin to tell you of all our lines of goods in one advertisement. Our stocks in House Furnishings, Boots and Shoes, Hardware, Groceries, etc., were never so complete.

These stores are literally packed with goods that were bought before the advance of prices and the benefits are for you to obtain. We fear no competition in neighboring stores, either in regard to stock or prices and only ask an opportunity to convince you of this by showing the goods.

We pay cash for any produce the farmer has to sell and give the Highest prices.

APPRECIATION OF FAITHFUL SERVICE.

At a meeting of the W. M. S. held in Hay Bay church, on June 5th, 1907, the following resolution was carried unanimously. It gives but a faint expression of the respect and love we have for our retiring pastor, Rev. J. Wesley Dawn, and his devoted wife.

Moved by Mrs. A. C. Parks, and seconded by Mrs. L. F. Bogart, that we, as members of the W. M. S. of Hay Bay, place ourselves on record in a hearty and unanimous expression of our high appreciation of the constant and valuable help we have received from our esteemed pastor, Rev. W. J. Dawn, and his faithful wife during the past three years.

We are sure that the unusual prosperity of our Society is in no small part due to the lively interest they have both taken in the mission work as represented by the W. M. S., and while we do not wish to be selfish in our choice, but would strive to be willing to share precious things with others, yet we cannot help feeling very sorry that we cannot have them with us for the fourth year. But seeing that it is impossible for us to have our wish in regard to keeping them with us, we will endeavor to surrender our claim with as much grace as possible and at the same time assure them of our best wishes and earnest prayers for their success in the new field to which they are called of God to go.

Church Consecration

One of the brightest and happiest of bright and happy Red Letter Days took place, when in the good Providence of God, the handsome parish church of St. Luke was consecrated and set apart for ever for Divine Service, on Sunday, June 16th, 1907, by the Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Ontario, who consecrated the church according to good old custom and order. The printed form of service used, was that ordered by Canon Law. The Bishop escorted by Rev. Rural Dean Dibb, Rev. F. D. Woodcock, Rev. T. F. Dewdney and Rev. O. A. L. McTear, marched to the west front doors, where he was met by the Rector and Messrs. John Robinson and Charles Riley, when the latter read the petition of Consecration, when the Bishop had assented thereto. Then a procession was formed, consisting of the Wardens, visiting Clergy and the Bishop, who walked up the aisle of the church to their proper places in the chancel, reciting Psalm 24. When the Bishop was seated on his throne the instruments of donation and endowment were presented to him, and he bowed his head and said the proper prayers at the altar, after which he publicly the name of the Consecration The Communion office was then proceeded with. The Bishop communicated the Clergy, and then four of the Clergy communicated the people. About 200 received.

Mrs. Woodcock sang very sweetly, as solos, "The Benedictus" and the "Agnus Dei." The organist and choir are to be congratulated on the splendid rendering of the musical portions of the service.

The altar was adorned with cut flowers. Rev. F. D. Woodcock preached a touching and sympathetic sermon, which went right to the hearts of his hearers. Mrs. Mills, wife of Rev. Bishop, was present, and expressed herself as delighted with the service. The Township of Camden was well represented. The day was one that can never be forgotten by the people of Camden East. All that was lacking was the presence of Rev. Canon Elliott, of Carleton Place. Rural Dean and Mrs. Mills did splendid service at the Rectory during their stay in Camden East.

At 3 p.m., the Bishop visited and preached at St. John's Church, at Newburgh. In baptism of the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Sutton, and the infant son of Mr. and Mrs. Mills and Mr. and Mrs. Woodcock and Mrs. Bishop were sponsors. Here the beautiful little church was crowded. At the request of the Rector, who said it was the wish of the donor, Mrs. A. W. Benjamin, of Napanee, and Messrs. Mr. John Ewart and Mr. Edward Barker, that the new altar should be consecrated. The Bishop complied with their request, and the service was hearty, and bright as usual. The Bishop preached a splendid sermon, and addressed the candidates most impressively. Rev. Rural Dean Dibb read the service, which all present thoroughly enjoyed and appreciated.

Sunday, June 16th.

The day was indeed and in truth a Red Letter Day. The Bishop and Mrs. Mills returned to Kingston with pleasant remembrances of their visit to Camden East. Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Connolly were hospitably entertained the Bishop and his wife while at Yarker. All thoroughly appreciated meeting Mr. and Mrs. Woodcock again.

Their only daughters came to Canada with them, two of whom survive, Mrs. Henry Briscoe, of Toronto, and Mrs. David McClew, of Galt. The other daughter, Mrs. H. M. NEWBURGH.

The Camden East and Newburgh baseball teams played a very exciting game at Diamond Park on Saturday last. The game went eleven innings and ended in a tie, when the umpire handed out a raw decision on the home team, and both teams quit. The locals should have won, however, without the limit. Dunn, who pitched the early part of the game, ran into a piece of hard luck right of the reel. The first two visiting batsmen fanned and then several errors allowed the visitors to score 4 runs. Shorey the southpaw, pitched a fine game for the visitors. Dee, Schultz and Montgomery, of Yarker, and Rose, of Selby, were on the team representing Camden East and did the trouble alone with the umpire. Fletcher Huffman, also of Yarker, handled the indicator. The locals a very poor exhibition, but the visitors some kinked straw-berry, but they took it all in good part. A return game will be played in Camden East later on, when they will endeavor to show that they have done.

Across Western Europe To Rome.

Rome, May 28th, 1907.

The Editor of The Beaver:

Dear Mr. Editor,—I now send you the second instalment of my letter concerning the wonderful sights to be seen in this wonderful city.

On Tuesday, May 21st, we went to see the ruined palaces of the Caesars and Nero's Golden House, and wonderful structures they must have been judging by the great ruins. It seemed strange to walk through halls that Nero and other Roman Emperors once trod, and to stand in the Forum, and to pass under the Arch of Titus, all these nearly 2,000 years ago. The most wonderful place of all was the Catacombs; great underground galleries, 40 to 90 feet beneath the level of the streets of Rome, and containing the bodies of the martyrs and other Christian dead. You can see their bones lying there yet in the tombs. Six million are buried in these tombs, which total 300 miles in length. All the leading truths of Christianity are also inscribed on these walls just as they were painted there 1700 years ago. You can see paintings representing The Baptism of Christ, The Resurrection, Feeding the Five Thousand, Raising of Lazarus, The Ascension of Christ, and many other leading truths.

On Thursday, all Canadians went to the Capitoline Hill and had our photographs taken in a group. These are to be published in the Toronto Globe and Montreal Star, I believe, as their reporters were there.

I was in the church where St. Paul is said to be buried, and saw his supposed tomb. I also saw the Santa Scala, or Holy Stairs, on which Luther was climbing on his knees when he heard the voice within his soul saying in thunder tones, "The just shall live by faith." He then tells us he turned back and went home to shake Europe, and split her into two great religious camps,—Protestants and Roman Catholics.

It is claimed here that these stairs which are of marble, were those ascended by Jesus Christ when he went to his trial before Pilate. They were brought from Jerusalem in the fourth century. They are half worn through by centuries of daily use by pilgrims ascending on their knees. A notice printed in English, French, German, Italian, etc., at the bottom informed visiting pilgrims that they will receive 9 years indulgence for each step ascended on their knees. Several were ascending whilst we were there.

In the Vatican I saw a part of the Latin Vulgate, or the oldest Bible in the world last one. It dates back to 389 A.D. It was the oldest in the world until Tischendorf, the great German scholar, found the famous Sinaitic Manuscript in an old convent in the forest of Mt. Sinai, in 1879 A.D. This is supposed to date back to A.D. 330. This manuscript is now in the St. Petersburgh library.

Most of the delegates are going home through Switzerland, but my friend from London, and I came south to Naples and Pompeii yesterday.

This morning we went through the ruins of Pompeii. Such a wide street after street as silent as death, while here and there can be seen the very household utensils they were using when the city was destroyed by the eruption of Vesuvius 1700 years ago. You can see skeletons encased in Master shower of ashes, position of the bodies as they found them when they excavated the city. Some are lying on their faces with one arm under the forehead. Others are upwards, with arms extended. Mothers and daughters lie close together just as they were caught by the burning lava. You can see the burnt cloth of their dresses, and the bread which was in the oven, burnt black, yet as complete as when the loaf was put in the oven 1700 years ago. Some of the paintings on the walls are vile beyond description, and this in the homes of the very wealthy.

This afternoon we ascended Vesuvius, and looked down into the crater, and threw stones into it. We took carriage from Pompeii to Resvatreacse, which was destroyed by last year's eruption. Some houses are broken in two, while others are tipped up on end. Acres, miles, and fine vineyards are covered here with lava 10 to 12 feet deep.

At this village we mounted horses and began our ascent through the enormous lava and rubble fields to the crater. I had a fine bay stallion as the others had never ridden on horseback much and were afraid of him. He proved to be just the thing for the climb, and I let him go as hard as he wanted to. We were 3½ hours ascending, and at 4 o'clock I stood on the crater, about 4,000 feet above the sea. It is like a gigantic saucer on the top, about a quarter of a mile across, with a great hole extending down into the bowels of the earth. It was smoking and boiling at the time. We threw some large stones down which caused a rumbling, roaring noise which rather frightened some of us for a time, and we feared we might have awakened the monster. In fact, one of the party proposed that we run for our lives! However, nothing further occurred to alarm us, and after we had taken several snap shots with our cameras, we came down again.

If any of your readers ever come that this way and take this climb, they must not let the guides make them through the soft ashes and stones up to their knees, as they invariably do, so you will exhaust yourself, and need a porter to assist you. They then share the fee.

When they tried this to-day, I saw a hard rider at the side and immediately left the guide and jumped on the ridge, which, when I found was safe I called to my friends to come too. If you had seen the look of disgust on the faces of those porters and the guide, it would have made you laugh. In a few minutes they dropped behind and the guide came over on the ridge himself. They are wolves for tips. One kicked up a row at the tip I gave him to-day, and held out his hand to return it. I quickly made a move to take it back and keep it, to teach him a lesson, when he shut his hand and cleared. Some one had served him this way before, and he knew what it meant.

Now I must close, as I have other correspondence to attend to to-night. I will write you another letter before I return to London if I get time.

Yours truly,
ALBERT CLOSE

THE THREE STAGES.

For the early stage, Scott's Emulsion is a cure. For the second stage it cures many. And for the last stages of consumption it soothes the cough and prolongs the life. 26

Three Lehigh Valley freight cars plunged into the creek at steel arch bridge at Niagara and dropped 200 feet into the river below. A couple of tramps are believed to have gone down in the wreck.

It is said that an offer well up in the millions has been made the Government for the mineralized portion of the Gillies limit.

Inquiry has been made by the United States of the British Government as to whether there is any objection to the stationing of another training ship on the great lakes.

A New Orleans woman was thin. Because she did not extract sufficient nourishment from her food. She took Scott's Emulsion. Result: She gained a pound a day in weight.

THE Masquerader

By Katherine Cecil Thurston, author of "The Circle," etc.

"What is it?" Ivor asked apprehensively. "What is it?"

By a swift involuntary movement she had tightened the pressure of her fingers, and, without using force, it was impossible for Ivor Loder to unloose them. With his hands pressed irresistibly over hers he looked down into her face.

"As I sat in the theater tonight, Eve," he said slowly, "all the pictures I had formed of life shifted. Without destruction, without knowing it, my whole point of view was changed. I suddenly saw things by the world's searchlight instead of by my own miserable candle. I suddenly saw things for you, instead of for myself."

Eve's eyes widened and darkened, but she said nothing.

"I suddenly saw the unpardonable wrong that I have done you, the imperative duty of cutting it short." He spoke very slowly in a dull, mechanical voice.

Eve, her eyes still wide, her face pulsed and alarmed, withdrew her hands from his shoulders. "You mean," she said, with difficulty, "that it is going to end? That you are going away? That you are giving everything up? Oh, but you can't! You mustn't!" she exclaimed, with sudden excitement, her fears suddenly overmastering her incredulity. "You can't! You mustn't! The only proof that could have interfered—"

"I wasn't thinking of the proof." "Then of what? Of what?"

Loder was silent for a moment. "Of our love," he said steadily.

She colored deeply. "But why?" she stammered. "Why? We have done no wrong. We need do no wrong. We would be friends, nothing more, and I—oh, I so need a friend!"

For almost the first time in Loder's knowledge of her voice broke, her control deserted her. She stood before him in all the pathos of her lonely girlhood—her cruel youth.

The revelation touched him with sudden poignancy. The real strength that had been in his faults, the chivalry buried under years of callousness, stirred at the birth of a new emotion. The devotion preserved at such a cost, the sacrifice that had seemed well nigh impossible, all at once took on a different aspect. What better had been a better duty became suddenly a sacred right. Holding out his arms, he drew her to him as if she had been a child.

"Eve," he said gently, "I have learned tonight how fully a woman's life is at the mercy of a man's mistake, and how scanty that mercy is. If circumstances had been different I believe—I am convinced—I would have made you a good husband—would have used my right to protect you as well as a man could use it. And now that things are different I want—I should like"— He hesitated a very little. "Now that I have no right to protect you, except the right my love gives, I want to guard you as closely from all that is sordid as any husband could guard you."

"In life there are really only two broad issues—right and wrong. Whatever we may say, whatever we may profess to believe, we know that our action is always a choice between right and wrong. A month ago—a week ago—I would have despised a man who could talk like this and have thrown his self-given gift of eloquence in his face. I know that strength of something more than the trampling of others into the dust that we ourselves may have a clear road; that it is something much harder and much less rid by the instincts that are standing aside to let somebody else pass on. Eve," he exclaimed suddenly, "I'm trying to do this for you. Don't you see? Don't you understand? The easy course, the highly course, would be to let things drift. Every instinct is calling to me to take that course—to go on as I have gone, trading on Chilcote's weakness and your generosity. But I won't do it. I can't do it!" With a swift impulse he loosed his arms and held her away from him. "Eve, it's the first time I have put another human being before myself."

Eve kept her head. Painful, inaudible sobs were shaking her from head to foot.

"It's something to you, something unconscious, something high and fine, that holds me back, that literally bars the way. Eve, can't you see that I'm fighting—fighting hard?"

After he had spoken there was silence, a long, painful silence, during which Eve waged the battle that so many of her sex have waged before, the battle in which words are useless and tears of no account. She looked very slight, very young, very forlorn, as she stood there. Then, in the oppressive scene of waiting that filled the whole room, she looked up at him.

A. E. PAUL

CENTREVILLE.

Our community was deeply grieved on Wednesday, 5th inst., to hear of the death of Mr. Samuel Long. Deceased had been in poor health for some time with heart trouble. Every thing that kind hands could do to relieve his poor sufferer was done, but he died in great peace with his family all around him, as was his wish, on Wednesday morning. Deceased was 73 years of age, and came from England with his parents at the age of eight years, and settled on a farm two miles west of the village of Enterprise. In the year 1860 he married Miss Samantha Clark, daughter of Mr. Jno. Clark, who survives him, also four children, Wesley Long, Mrs. Wm. Fairbairn, Mrs. Thos. McGill and Miss Jennie at home. Also three brothers and two sisters, Henry, of Montana, Will, of Kansas City, Edmond, of Napanee, Mrs. Lockwood of St. Thomas, and Mrs. Cox, of Allenford, to mourn the loss of a kind and loving husband, father and brother. He was a good neighbor, always ready to help anyone in trouble. In religion he was a Methodist and in politics a staunch conservative. The funeral service was conducted by the Rev. R. Allin on Friday, June 7th. Deceased was buried under the Orange order of which he had been a member since the age of eighteen. Much sympathy is extended to the sorrowing widow and family in their deep trouble. A large number gathered to pay their last respects to him whom they respected so highly.

Mr. Bloe our new merchant, having bought Mr. Madden's store a short time ago, is now about settled. His family arrived yesterday from Belleville, Ont. We are sure Mr. Bloe will be able to please all who may patronize him. He seems to be all a storekeeper should be. He is in partnership with a gentleman in Madoc, and is conducting a general store there. The merchant who pays cash for his goods is the one who sells right. There is a good farming country about here, so we do not see why a merchant here cannot succeed. We wish Mr. Bloe success.

WHAT IS JUNK?

Answer—

Cash, if properly handled. Few people realize that the waste or worn out material, such as old rubbers, brass, copper, lead, zinc, rags, bones, and all kinds of scrap iron is worth at least an average of $12.00 per year, per family, if properly taken care of and delivered at my Junk Yard, west side of Market Square, Napanee.

Take for example, old worn out rubbers. At present I am paying 2 cents a lb. for old rubber boots and shoes, including old rubber gum boots. Why, then, sell them for two to three cents a lb. to some wandering Jew or some other tramp peddler, when by selling them to me, you can get seven cents a lb.? Remember I am paying the highest cash prices for all kinds of old junk, delivered at my yard.

Parties in town, leaving word at my office or sending me a postal card or drop a letter, I will send after your junk and pay spot cash for same at my office. Out of town parties, ship your junk by rail or boat to me and receive prompt cash returns for same.

Right Breathing Cures Catarrh

SIMPLE WAY TO KILL CATARRHAL GERMS IN NOSE, THROAT AND LUNGS.

The only natural and common sense method known for the cure of catarrhal troubles is Hy-o-mei. It is breathed through an ingenious pocket inhaler, so that its medicated air reaches the most remote air-cells of the nose, throat and lungs, killing all catarrhal germs, soothing the irritated mucous membrane, and restoring a healthy condition.

Hy-o-mei goes right to the spot where the catarrhal germs are present in the nose, throat and lungs, and destroys the germs so that perfect health is soon restored.

A complete Hy-o-mei outfit with inhaler costs but $1.00, and is sold by T. B. Wallace under guarantee to refund the money unless the remedy gives satisfaction.

—Dr. Yorke-Davies's article on Harmless Beverages in Relation to Health, in THE LIVING AGE for June 22d, gives some highly important suggestions on certain much-discussed points with the authority of an expert and the charm of a clever essayist.

"The little pocket physician" is what Hy-o-mei's friends named the pocket inhaler that goes with each outfit. Carries medication right to the spot where it's needed. Complete outfit, $1.00, at T. B. Wallace's.

Hurried business men, worried mothers who do not take time to eat, and disciples of every age and condition, will find relief in Mi-o-na stomach tablets. Fifty cents a box; nothing if they fail. T. B. Wallace.

Address and Presentation.

The number that gathered at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Snider, on Monday evening, went to show that the people of Arden realized that in the removal of Mr. and Mrs. Snider to reside in Napanee, they were losing one of the best citizens. The farewell was all a surprise to them, but everyone knew they would be welcomed. The following address was read by Miss Clara Delbar:

Arden, Ont., June 3d, 1907.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Snider:

Dear Friends and Brother and Sister in Christ,—We are gathered around your home to-night, for the purpose of expressing our good feeling toward you both, as residents of this township and citizens of the village, for a number of years, and for the active part you have taken in promoting its interests by seeking to advance the welfare of its people. We have watched with great zeal and earnestness you have devoted your energies to whatever you had taken in hand to do, and which cause was always a worthy one.

And especially those of us who have been hand in hand and shoulder to shoulder with you in the Methodist church, as our class leader, a steward and sexton. We feel that we have very reason to speak of you, in the discharging of your duty in these offices, in the very highest terms. Your services have been appreciated, and we feel we owe a gratitude to you for the sacrifice you have made in our behalf. The church will feel your absence to be a great loss, your support together with your presence, and we feel it will be hard to find a successor to fill the vacancy you have so well and favorably filled.

However, we wish to offer you our heartiest and best wishes for a bright, prosperous future, and hoping that your usefulness may continue uninjured for a long time to come, and that those among whom you may make your future home may be given to share in the benefit of your helpful labors as we have here.

We remain,
Fraternally yours,
Your many friends in Arden.

Mr. Snider gave a reply, assuring all of his friends of his deep interest in whatever was being done for the greatest good, for the welfare and happiness of the people.

Addresses were given by the chairman, Dr. Geddes, by the pastor of the Methodist church, Rev. Mr. Crowe, and by councillor Bonter, Greggor and Mr. Charles Loyst.

After the presentation had been served by the ladies, the remainder of the evening was spent in the exchange of good wishes, with Mr. and Mrs. Snider.

DR. WILLIAMS' PINK PILLS, THE ONE MEDICINE BEST SUITED FOR THE WHOLE HOUSEHOLD.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills are the greatest blood-builder and nerve medical science. They never fail to make rich, red blood and it is this kind that brings health and strength to the sufferer. They are a family medicine good for the grandmother or grandfather, the mother or father and for the growing children. Those who have found new health and strength through the use of these pills. As proof of their being a family medicine Mrs. Chas. Castonguay, Shipmeeken River, tells us:

My husband was ill for five months and was unable to do any work. He made several trips to the States to consult doctors and spent much money on medicine but nothing helped him, in fact he grew worse. He could not eat much and the little he did eat would not remain on his stomach. His stomach was examined by Dr. Hays and found to be in a terribly inflamated condition. After remaining at the Soo for some time under the doctor's care without finding relief, he returned home discouraged and afraid he was going to die. He then tried Dr. Williams' Pink Pills were recommended and by the time he had taken nine boxes he was perfectly well, and able to go to work again. Mrs. Castonguay continues: I have also used the Pills for female troubles and found them a perfect success. My little one also has good health and a rosy color to them.

Dr. Williams Pink Pills cure all the troubles due to poor blood or shattered nerves, such as anaemia, rheumatism, dyspepsia, neuralgia, St. Vitus dance, partial paralysis, etc., simply because they make rich, red, healthgiving blood. Thomas Cribb, alias Dr Newbrge's Herpicide.

Proof of Info has been in every-body's mouth, and many are wondering about ourselves, though no one can be found who will deny that HERPICIDE does the one thing. Its information of thousands of people to tell about a good thing, and say that HERPICIDE is the cause of Herpicide, is the family name of a brand by various vegetable parasites which causes baldness, and falling hair, this destroys, after which the HERPICIDE destroys, after which the HERPICIDE destroys, after which the HERPICIDE destroys. Big Circus at Belleville.

FOREPAUGH AND SELLS BROS' SHOW TO EXHIBIT THERE ON JUNE 26th.

The people in and around this town (and there are an opportunity) of seeing the great Adam Forepaugh and Sells Bros. combined show, at the point of exhibition being Belleville, on June 26th. Since last seen in this part of the country their great enterprise has grown to such an extent that it is much the largest circus in the world and it has been greatly improved that it standsunsurpassed in point with any other similar form of entertainment.

Millions of dollars was spent on the parade alone in delivery and for the purpose of making it a complete departure from old lines. There is absolutely new idea in the way of street spectacles, longer than any other and not one thing in it that can be seen anywhere else. In it alone are 1,200 people, 600 horses and more than half the elephants in America. All the costumes, banners and trappings are of the finest silk; the harness is silver mounted and the wonderful chariots and dens, are hand-carved and decorated with gold leaf.

Another fortune was spent in devising for an introductory to the regular street parade. The show's spectacle ever presented, "Fighting the Flames." As visitors enter the main tent they are confronted by a solid mass of city blocks, filling the entire area of the tent, given the realistic action of a great metropolis by a thousand shoppers, business men, office boys, fire laddies, bootblacks, peddlers, policemen and loafers, all mingled in the rush and bustle of city street life. The pavements are overrun by cabs, street cars, automobiles, trucks, fire engines and express wagons. It is a holiday and a procession comes down the street. While the throng line the sidewalks to look on the festive scene, the cry of fire is raised, and at the top of the story of a hotel a thread of smoke is seen issuing. A policeman turns an alarm in a corner signal box, an explosion in the hotel basement bursts an avalanche of firebrands over the heads of the people on the street; policemen force the crowds back and streets are cleared, women and children, imprisoned in the upper floors of the hotel, rend the air with their cries of terror.

The clang of gongs is heard and amid the cheers of the crowd engines, hook and ladder wagons, hose carts and stand pipes rumble around the corner, manned by brave crews with helmets and axes. Then ensues a thrilling battle of fire and water with human lives as the stake. Firemen mount the ladders and carry children to safety; women, driven by the flames, jump into the life nets held by firemen below; then the thrilling climax, the rescue by one of the most dramatic intensity and strikingly beautiful.

The performance which follows is made up of European acts new to this country. The key note of everything is novelty. There is not an old act to be seen and no circus in the world ever presented one specialty that will compare with any of fifty with the Adam Forepaugh and Sells Brothers' circus.

KILPATRICK—PATTERSON.

The marriage of Miss Alma, daughter of Mrs. R. Patterson, and Mr. James Kilpatrick, son of Mr. Robt. Kilpatrick, was solemnized Monday, 17th June, at noon, at St. Paul's church, Amherst Island. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Jas. Cruickenshank, and the bride was given away by her brother, Mr. Sheridan Patterson. She wore a gown of white silk mulmoire over taffeta, with corsnet of orange blossoms supporting the bridal veil. Her bouquet was of white carnations. Miss Jennie Filson, wearing white and carrying a bouquet of pink carnations, acted as bridesmaid, and the groom was supported by his brother, Mr. Arthur Kilpatrick. The church was very prettily and tastefully decorated for the occasion. After the ceremony the bridal party, accompanied by the near relatives of each of the contracting parties, drove to the home of the bride's mother where all enjoyed the sumptuous repast prepared for them, and a pleasant afternoon was spent. The bride and groom left in the evening by str. Alexandria for a honeymoon to Montreal. That the young couple may have a long and happy life together is the sincere wish of all who knew them.

FUNERAL OF PAUL HUSTER.

Watertown, N.Y., June 19.—The home of the late Paul Huster at No. 20 Woodruff st. was filled and the lawn and walks thronged at 3 o'clock this afternoon by an immense throng of mourning friends, who included big delegations from every Odd Fellow lodge of the city and representatives from a number of town lodges, the large gathering testifying to the esteem and regard in which the deceased in this community, his adopted home.

The funeral services at the house were conducted by the Rev. Thomas Lakey, pastor of Stone Street Presbyterian church. The funeral procession was a very long one and the passing car, the carriage being led by Robert Ridgley, No. H, Fairfield's Mystical, of which order deceased was a past Colonel, in full uniform. They were followed by Monroe commandery, No. 1, U.O.D.F., of which the deceased brother had been a regular member for many years. Delta lodge, No. 138, I.O.O.F., over which the deceased had presided as noble grand, and Watertown lodge, No. 1, I.O.O.F., of which he had been treasurer, and by delegations from Utica, Rome, Utica and Corning, with many other lodges outside the city, which he had represented as district deputy grand master of Unity Rebekah lodge, of which he had been a member, and from Garland Rebekah lodge, following in carriages.

At North Watertown cemetery the committal ritual of the Odd Fellow order was pronounced by Rev. Thomas Lakey, pastor and Chaplain George Little, of Jefferson Union lodge.

Paul Huster was born in the Village of Tamworth, Canada, Nov. 29, 1841. He received a good education, and afterward learned the cabinet maker's trade, at which he worked there for a number of years. He was a musician of ability and a remarkable performer upon the flute, and his services were sought for and sent by the many musical bands of the locality in which he lived. In the city Watertown years ago and was employed by the Watertown Paper company, becoming a very skilful carriage maker. For a while he conducted a grocery store in the Fieldston Armade. As already stated he was very prominent in the Odd Fellow lodges of the city, being a past noble grand, presiding officer and his manner of delivering the ritualistic work and obligations and ritualistic work being most impressive. He was scrupulously precise and accurate in all the transactions of the lodges of Jefferson Union lodge when handed over for his accounts at the last evening at the regular lodge meeting were found to be correct, though prior to that time he had never kept a set of books and his accounts exact to a penny. He was a devoted husband and father, a kind neighbor, a consistent and hypocrisy and always ready to lend a helping hand to the needy. He had many friends by his manliness and sunny disposition, and his passing away is mourned by a very large circle.

He leaves a widow, Mrs. Catherine Huster, Miss Greta Huster, Tamworth, Canada; a daughter, Miss Elnora Huster, and three brothers, John Huster, Tamworth, and three sisters, Mrs. Amelia Ingersoll, Joseph Hunter, of Wisconsin; also three sisters, Mrs. Frank Foster, Mrs. Wm. Foster and Mrs. Emma Hunter, all of Tamworth.

The floral tributes were very beautiful. The offerings of carnations and roses from the Odd Fellow lodges, Rebekah lodges, Monroe commandery, Mystical Seven, Utica lodge, Rome lodge, Corning lodge, Watertown lodge, Garland Rebekah lodge, Unity Rebekah lodge, Jefferson Union lodge, wreath of carnations and roses from Unity Rebekah lodge, wreath of carnations and roses from Jefferson Union lodge, wreath of roses from Mrs. Bryden, wreath of roses from Mrs. Fred Gardner, wreath from Mr. and Mrs. Frank Foster, wreath from Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Hunter, casket piece from Mr. and Mrs. A. While we are giving special attention this week to women's goods, we must not forget the men, for this store has long stood for what is best in men's clothing. There are good fitting, up-to-date suits here that would cost nearly twice as much at a custom tailor's and besides you have the advantage of seeing just how the suit will look before you buy.

ERNESTTOWN STATION.

Fire broke out in a mysterious manner, Tuesday afternoon, on the premises of W. Amey's property, west of station, occupied by R. Baker. For a time the place seemed doomed, and F. Laidley, the only available man in the vicinity, who with the women of the neighborhood forming a bucket brigade, worked heroically and stamped out the flames before serious damage was done. Had the fire not been noticed for a few minutes longer, every building in the place would have been consumed, as a strong west wind was blowing.

The Union church shed, for a long time in an unsafe condition, has been repaired.

Rev. D. Aylesworth, Michigan, on a visit to his old home, accompanied Rev. IN OLD ADOLPHUSTOWN

Cradle of Ontario's History

By MAUDE BENSON

Toronto Globe

The name of Adolphustown, which will shortly be visited by the Ontario Historical Society, brings to mind many memories of the past. Every inch of its soil is treasured, for every inch was wrested from the stubborn forest by the energy and sacrifice of as noble a band of men and women as the world has ever known. This Mecca of lovers of Canada's history occupies one of the most beautiful positions on the picturesque Bay of Quinte, and its broad lands extend into the pure waters of the bay like so many jewelled fingers pointing toward Prince Edward county's wonderful lake-on-the-mountain. Its inlets curve in lovingly, as though striving to bring nearer to the last resting place of the honored dead the requiem of their rippling flood. The village extends some distance along old Dundas street, and is composed of many comfortable homes, substantially built, several churches, a few business houses, and, in fact, such environments as one naturally expects to find in a small country village. But Adolphustown possesses much more than does the ordinary village, and one has only to visit the old Loyalist burying ground to be brought to a realization of its wealth of possession.

Whatever point of view we may hold as to the right or wrong of the American revolution, we must freely give a tribute of praise to the Loyalistic devotion to King and country. The writer numbers among her friends several members of "the Daughters of the Revolution," and in conversation with them the fact that the average American underestimates the social standing of the Loyalists prior to the outbreak of the war is very apparent. In the majority of cases the Loyalists were descendants of prominent old-world families. They were cultured and often wealthy, and Canada to-day can look back as proudly to her "Loyalist makers" as does old England to her Saxon and Norman ancestry.

One's first visit in Adolphustown is naturally to the old graveyard. This is no longer used, but a handsome grey granite monument about a hundred feet from the entrance, a solid Kingstone base, takes the place of many of the old wooden and sandstone slabs that heretofore had been the sole means of preserving this spot from oblivion. A few of these old stones, rudely chiselled, are still to be seen, but from most of them the names are partially or wholly obliterated. The new monument was erected at the time of the centennial celebration held here in 1884. It bears the following inscription :—

In memory of the U. E. Loyalists Who through loyalty to British Institutions Left the U. S. and landed on these Shores on the 16th of June, A. D. 1784.

Some of the most prominent and influential men of their day in this Province sleep here in unknown graves. Among these is the grave of Major Peter Van Alstine, the leader of the first detachment of Loyalists who reached this place. He was also the representative in the first and second Parliaments of Upper Canada for Adolphustown and Prince Edward. It said of him that he knew every man, woman and child in the whole township. Still another is Nicholas Hagerman, on whose farm this burying-ground is located. He was the first regularly authorized practicing lawyer in Upper Canada. He had three sons who were likewise lawyers in their day. Two of these sons were members of the Family Compact Government," Later this son became a Chief Justice. He was the father-in-law of the late Hon. John Beverley Robinson, Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario.

A large new monument marks the Casey plot. Willet Casey was a member of the fourth Parliament. He was considered a very wealthy man in his day. His son, Captain Samuel Casey, is also buried here. He was likewise a member of the early Parliaments. A number of the Allison, Roblin and Hoover families sleep here. In fact, there are very few of the old families who settled in the Bay district but have a representative here.

The first interment made was that of a little child, who died while the Loyalists were still occupying the canvas tents with which the Government had supplied them. When the settlers reached here they were told that the business of surveying lots had not been completed and that until that was finished no apportionment could be made, as each family was to receive its farm by "drawing lots." It was while they waited that the little girl died, and was buried just back of the encampment. The same summer Casper Hoover, who had scarcely taken possession of his land, and commenced the work of clearing away the forest, was killed by a falling limb. He was the second person buried here. His son, Henry Hoover, was taken prisoner during the war, and for two years was chained in a bare cell to a negro. He was the only person on record belonging to the Van Alstine company, who drew land like the rest. He also sleeps in the old burying-ground, as does his mother, Barbara Roblin, who was a relative of Sir Isaac Brock.

The second visit in Adolphustown would be paid to the handsome new memorial church, St. Alban's. The corner stone of this church was laid during the celebration week by Lieut.-Governor Hon. J. Beverley Robinson. A panel at the end of this church bears the following words: "One hundred years after the landing of a band of United Empire Loyalists on these shores this church of St. Alban the Martyr is built in pious memory of those patriots who became the founders of the Province of Ontario, in honor of their loyalty and the fear of God, 1884." This church was opened for service in 1890 and is a fitting monument to those whose memory it was designed to perpetuate.

Old St. Paul's church is now used as a church hall in connection with St. Alban's. It is a roughcast build ing in the Early English style. It was built in 1823 during the incumbency of Rev. John Pearson, the first rector of Adolphustown.

A Methodist U. E. L. memorial church also graces the village. The corner stone was laid by Mrs. Jos. Allison in 1884. Mrs. Allison was at that time the oldest surviving member of the Methodist U. E. L. families. She was the daughter of Casper Hoover, of whom mention has been made. With reluctance one prepares to leave Adolphustown, the village that has evaded such old families as the Allisons, Robbins, Ruttans, Bogarts, Allens, Caseys, Derlands, Vanlwons, Haermans, Huffs, Noxons, Trumpours, Watsons, Wrights, Petersons, and many others whose names the writer does not recall. A noble band were they who

"Loved the cause
That had been lost, and scorned an alien name,
Passed into exile, leaving all behind
Except their honor and their conscientious pride
Of duty done to country and to King."

And nobly in all walks of life their descendants are carrying on the good work they commenced in the upbuilding of Canada.

U. M. Wilson, M.P.

It does not fall to many men to receive the great honor which Mr. Wilson has had conferred on him for the sixth time—the unanimous nomination of the Liberal-Conservatives as their representative in the Dominion Parliament, and if he is not proud of this marked distinction and appreciation, he is hard to please.

There was a large attendance of representatives here from all parts of the united Riding of Lennox and Addington in the Council yesterday afternoon, owing to the death of Mr. J. R. Fraser, president, Mr. R. A. Pringle, vice-president, was called on to preside, and the following officers were appointed :

President—A. Fowler, Emerald.
Vice-President—R. Dafoe, Wilton.
Secretary—H. H. Richardson, Napanee, for Addington ; G. F. Ruttan, Napanee, for Lennox.
Treasurer—W. N. Boller, Napanee.

After a considerable discussion as to whether this was the proper time to select a candidate, the following names were proposed : Dr. Ellis, Tyendinaga ; Thos. Wesenitch, Wm. J. Paul, M.P.P., Napanee ; Mr. Bogart, Bogart, Newcastle ; Mr. Bogart declined the nomination, and the names of Messrs. Wilson and Bogart were then proposed to the Nominating Committee. Mr. Wilson was declared the choice by a large majority.

The vote was then made unanimous for Mr. Wilson, who thanked the meeting for this continued assurance of their confidence. Mr. Wesenitch, M.P.P., Napanee, was then elected district representative, and he had to catch the 4.25 train for Toronto to attend Government meeting on extravagance grants.

A resolution was also passed appreciative of Mr. Bogart's services, which, under the able leader, Hon. R. L. Borden.

We regret that we have no space for fuller particulars of one of the best Conservative nominating gatherings ever held here.

Give Fair Play to

A really reliable remedy for headache Zutoo.

If you have got it into your head that Zutoo Tablets will hurt you, you are mistaken.

It isn't fair to us for you to judge Zutoo by the drug cures.

It isn't fair to yourself to suffer from headache, when this really harmless vegetable headache cure is within your reach.

The fair thing for both of us is—to judge Zutoo on its merits—to test it.

If you find it does not cure your headache, ask no more of us; there, and I always looked forward to the time when I might see the spot where he grew up first.

In Rome I met a Cleveland, Ohio, gentleman, who said to me, on seeing my Canadian badge, where I came from? I said, Napanee. He replied, I belonged near Kingston some years ago, and my name is Sidney Baldwin. I have friends named Caton back of Napanee, and others named Clark near Odessa. It seemed strange that far off in Rome I should meet by chance men who knew Napanee. I also met at Mr. Mackintosh from Saskatchewan, who knew the Lakes from Morven and the other friends who lived out years ago. Really, I felt in touch with home again. We left Florence this morning for Pisa, where we go to the Baldwinson Valleys to visit the spots where the lamp of the faith was faithfully maintained the Protestant faith during those terrible years of persecution.

Tuesday, June 4th.—Have just returned from a visit to the Waldo valleys. Saw the precipice, 6,000 feet in height, from which more than 200 men, women and children were done to death on the rocks below. They were hiding in a cave in the rock, but were discovered and caught and thrown over the eastern face of the precipice. I took a photograph of the spot from the valley below.

I walked up the Angrona Valley over the very road those faithful men, women and children traversed when they were driven up the slopes. Pastor Trom, who speaks English, pointed out the historic spots.

They lived for years away on the tops of these Alpine heights, far above the level which ordinary men could climb to go, and supported their families on potatoes, cabbages, etc. until peace was declared and they were restored to their homes again in A.D. 1689. They are a fine race—with beautiful women. I looked several times when I stepped off the train and saw the women, to see if they were not English or American, as they were so beautiful, both in form and face, when compared with the average women on the continent. They have a fine church at Torre Pelice, 35 miles west of Turin. Gen. Beckwith, who fought at Waterloo, built it for them, I believe. He married one of them and died about 1865. His daughter still lives in the valleys.

Tuesday night, June 4th, left Turin by the Paris express, 11.35 p.m., splendid run of 14 hours. Passed on same train a beautiful young lady, over the summit of Mt. Cenis at 1 a.m., and at 2.30 were awakened by the French Customs Officers coming in to examine our baggage at Modane.

Magnificent view of Alps as the sun rose. Lower slopes mantled with dark forests, of pines, and the peaks capped with snow which shone like silver in the light of the rising sun.

Had one of my letters stolen in Florence. Postal employees steal English and American letters in the hope of finding postal orders or money.

Paris, Thursday, 2.30—Just arrived. Met many of our old friends who came here through Switzerland.

Saw Napoleon's Tomb at the Invalides. His body is encased in a great Finland granite coffin, which stands on a pedestal. You must look down from a circular railing into the crypt below to see it. Around the coffin worked in mosaic are the names of the great victories he won, Austerlitz, Jena, Marengo, Rivoli, Wagram, Moscow, etc. Opposite each name are shown the flags taken from the enemy in this battle. I counted 43 flags, but could not see them all among them, because he never won a victory over the British and there were no flags to count.

The gates of his tomb are mode of bronze, cast from the guns taken by his troops in his great battles. In St. Paul's, in London, on the other hand, you can see Wellington's funeral car, which was cast from the guns took from the French in the Peninsular war and at Waterloo. It weighs six tons and cost $100,000, and took two months to construct. On the sides of this car are the names of his great victories, Talavera, Salamances Badajos, Albuera, Vittoria, Toulouse, Waterloo, etc. I could not help thinking as I looked at those doors of bronze and also at Wellington's car, when I saw it some months ago, of the awful struggles which had taken place and that streams of blood when it was in the shape of guns, and of the blood and tears and treasure it had cost. You can place your hand right on the coffins of both Wellington and Napoleon, in St. Paul's. They both stand on pedestals.

Friday, 2.40 p.m., left Paris for London. Rough weather in the Channel. Very seasick. American papers declared that I will never see America again if I sail as badly as I did to-night.

Midnight, arrived safe in London. Glad to be back in a country where English is spoken by everyone. I will now close my long letter, and settle down to work again.

Yours truly,

O'HARE VS. RICHMOND.

The last cause on for trial before His Lordship George F. Henderson. Referee Lash-Lewis of Ontario and was tried here Friday and Saturday last at 11 a.m. and created great interest among the residents of Richmond as this is a continuation of the troubles arising from the defective drain on the north side of Main street. Although judgment was given for plaintiff in 19.2 directing the defendants to proceed at once to place the works in proper repair, the plaintiff not being satisfied with the report with which the work was accomplished applied to the court for an order to remit the council of 1906 and for $500 damages. The learned judge holding that the council has been reasonably diligent and not in the performance of their duty, refused the first claim of the plaintiff and in order to impress upon the municipal corporation the necessity for active steps being taken and undue delay being avoided granted the plaintiff nominal damages at $100 as he held that the plaintiff had probably suffered some damage by the delay. The following is the formal judgment of the court as finally settled and signed by the Referee.

1. This action coming on before His Lordship George F. Henderson, Junior, Drainage Referee a d upon motion seen made unto this Court this day on behalf of the Plaintiff and upon reading the pleadings and proceedings and upon hearing evidence on behalf of the Plaintiff and defendants and upon hearing Counsel for both parties

2. This Court doth declare and adjudge that the Plaintiffs d recover from the defendants the sum of one hundred dollars damages to be borne by said municipality and pay the cost of general fund.

3. It is ord r d doth further order and adjudge that the s ta of and incidental to the said trial and this r der of the plaintiff and defendants be taxed on the High Court scale and be paid by the said defendant municipality to the said plaintiff and that the lands in any way assessed for the drainage works assigning to the assessment hereof for construction or maintenance and may be assessed, levied on and collected in the same manner as to a assessed, levied and collected under this Act and the same be placed upon the Collector's rol for the year A. D. 1907, and collected in the same manner as other taxes in the municipality for the year A.D. 1907, and this judment and order shall be sufficient auth rity for the collection of the same without the necessity of passing any further or other By-law for that purpose.

4. And this court do h further order and adjudge that when the said drainage works have been repaired and improved according to plans and directions of F. F. Miller or such other engineer hereafter appointed by the flow of water through the rock cutting at the new culvert under Dr. Line No. 623, that the said drainage works will be completed and in good repair in the original construction By-law of the said defendant municipality known as By-law No. 291.

RE DAFOE AND WALLER'S OFFER

The following communication was received by the Town Council on Wednesday night:

Napanee, June 19th, 1907.

The Mayor and Council of the Town of Napanee.

Dear Sirs,—Your Clerk has acquainted me with the request of the Council to obtain my opinion respecting the proposed contract let on Messrs. Dafoe and Waller's property on the corner of Napanee.

Under ordinary circumstances the town would have power to enter into such a contract, but for a period not exceeding ten years, with the provision that it may be renewed from time to time. The Council would not under any circumstances have the power to enter into such a contract for 12 years, however, of the opinion that the Council have no power at the present time to deal with the matter at all. In a recent by-law the management and control of the Electric Light Works of the town was given over to a Board of Commissioners, and while it is advisable and prudent that the Commissioners should on all important matters confer with the Council, yet they are under no obligation to do so, and the Council cannot divest the Commissioners of their power or assume to perform the duties of them. I am further of opinion that as Mr. Dafoe is one of the proposed contracting parties, the Commissioners themselves cannot, as at present constituted enter into such an arrangement.

If such a contract be deemed desirable by the town, Mr. Dafoe should resign his position as Commissioner and another Commissioner be appointed in his place The negotiations could be resumed and carried through to completion if considered desirable. By a recent amendment of the statute, any vacancy in the Board can be filled by the Council forthwith so that very little time need be lost in bringing out your plan.

Yours truly,

W. S. HERRINGTON,

THE Masquerader

By Katherine Cecil Thurston, author of "The Circles," etc.

At last, slowly, almost reluctantly, he turned round. "I'm afraid things aren't quite—quite right," he said in a low voice. "The door is locked, and I can see no light."

She raised her eyes quickly. "But you have a key?" she whispered. "Haven't you got a key?" It was obvious that to both the unexpected check to their designs was fraught with danger.

"Yes, but"— He looked toward the door. "Yes, I have a key. Yes, you're right," he added quickly. "I'll use it. Wait while I go inside."

Filled with a new nervousness, oppressed by the loneliness, the silence about her, Eve drew back obediently. The sense of mystery conveyed by the closed door weighed upon her. Her susceptibilities were keenly alert as she watched Loder search for his key and insert it in the lock. With simplified detail and certainty she saw the door yield and gape open like a black gash in the dingy wall, and, with a sudden sense of desertion she saw him pass through the aperture and heard him strike a match.

The wait that followed seemed extraordinarily long. Listening intently, she heard him move softly from one room to the other. And at last, to her acutely nervous susceptibilities, it seemed that he paused in absolute silence. In the intensity of listening she heard her own faint, irregular breathing, and the sound filled her with panic. The quiet, the solitude, the vague, instinctive apprehension, became suddenly unendurable. Then all at once the tension was relieved. Loder reappeared.

He paused for a second in the shadow of the doorway; then he turned unsteadily, drew the door to and locked it.

Eve stepped forward. Her glimpse of him had been momentary—and she had not heard his voice—yet the consciousness of his bearing filled her with instinctive alarm. Always and without reason her hands turned cold, her heart began to beat violently. "John"—she said to her heart hotly.

For answer he moved toward her. His face was bereft of color; there was a look of consternation in his eyes. "Come," he said. "Come at once. I must take you home." He spoke in a sickly, uneven voice.

Eve, looking up at him, caught his hand. "Why? Why?" she questioned. Her tone was low and scared.

Without replying he drew her impetuously toward the stairs. "Go very softly," he commanded. "No one must see you here."

In the first moment she obeyed him instinctively; then, reeding the head of the stairs, she stopped. With one hand still clasping his, the other clinging nervously to the banister, she refused to descend. "John," she whispered, "I'm not a child. What is it? What has happened? I must know."

For a moment Loder looked at her uncertainly; then, reading the expression in her eyes, he yielded to her demand.

"He's dead," he said in a very low voice. "Chilcote is dead."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

TO fully appreciate a great announcement we must have time at our disposal. At the moment of Loder's disclosure Eve was denied to Eve, for scarcely had the words left his lips before the thought that dominated him asserted its prior claim. Blind to the incredulity in her eyes, he drew her swiftly forward and—half impelling, half supporting her—forced her to descend the stairs.

Never in after life could he obliterate the remembrance of that descent. Fear, such as he could never experience in his own concerns, possessed him. One desire overrode all others, the desire that Eve's reputation, which he himself had so nearly imperiled, should remain unimpeached. In the shadow of that urgent duty, the despair of the past hours, the appalling fact so lately realized, the future, with its possible trials, became dark to his imagination. In his new victory over self the question of her protection predominated.

Moving under his compulsion, he guided her hastily and silently down the deserted stairs, drawing a breath of deep relief as one after another the landings were successfully passed, and still actuated by the suppressed need of haste, he passed through the doorway they had entered by and chose a different conditions only a few minutes before.

To leave the quiet court, to gain the Strand, to hail a belated hansom, was the work of a moment. By an odd contrivance of circumstance the task that had attended every phase of his dual life was again exerted in his behalf. No one had noticed their exit from Clifford's Inn; no one was moved to curiosity by their exit. With an involuntary thrill of feeling he gave expression to his relief:

"Thank God it's over!" he said as a cab drew up. "You don't know what the strain has been."

Moving as if in a dream, Eve stepped into the cab. As yet the terrible disconcerts to their enterprise had made no clear impression upon her mind. For the moment all that she was conscious of, all that she instinctively acknowledged, was the fact that Loder was still beside her.

In quiet obedience she took her place, drawing aside her skirts to make room for him, and in the same methodical manner he stepped into the vehicle. Then, with the strange sensation of reliving their earlier drive, they were again of the tight-ed rein and of the horse's first forward movement.

For several seconds neither spoke. Eve, shutting out all other thoughts, sat close to Loder, clinging tenaciously to the momentary comforting sense of protection. Loder, striving to marshal his ideas, hesitated before the ordeal of speech. At last, realizing his responsibility, he turned to her slowly.

"Eve," he said in a low voice and with some hesitation, "I want you to know that in all this—from the moment I saw him—from the moment I understood—I have had you in my thoughts—you and no one else."

She raised her eyes to his face.

"Do you realise"— he began afresh. "Do you know what this—this thing means?"

Still she remained silent.

"It means that after tonight there will be no such person in London as John Loder. Tomorrow the man who was known by that name will be found in his rooms; his body will be removed, and at the post mortem examination it will be stated that he died of an overdose of morphia. His charwoman will identify him as a solitary man who lived respectably for years and then suddenly went down hill with remarkable speed. It will be quite a common case. Nothing of interest will be found in his rooms. No relation will claim his body. After the usual time he will be given the usual burial of his class. These details are horrible, but there are times when we must look at the horrible side of life, because life is incomplete without it.

"These things I speak of are the things that will meet the casual eye, but in our sight they will have a very different meaning.

"Eve," he said, more vehemently, "a whole chapter in my life has been closed tonight, and my first instinct is to shut the book and throw it away. But I'm thinking of you. Remember, I'm thinking of you. Whatever the trial, whatever the difficulty, no harm shall come to you. You have my word for that.

"I'll return with you now to Grosvenor square. I'll remain there till a reasonable excuse can be given for Chilcote's going abroad. I will avoid Praide. I will cut politics—whatever the cost. Then at the first reasonable moment I will do what I would do now, tonight, if it were possible. I'll go away, start afresh; do in another country what I have done in this."

There was a long silence; then Eve turned to him. The apathy of a moment before had left her face. "In another country?" she repeated. "In another country?"

"Yes, a fresh career in a fresh country, something clean to offer you. I'm not too old to do what other men have done."

He paused, and for a moment Eve looked ahead at the gleaming chain of lamps. Then very slowly she brought her glance back again. "No," she said very slowly. "You are not too old. But there are times when one sees things like age—are not the real consideration. It seems to me that your own inclination, your own individual sense of right and wrong, has nothing to do with the present moment. The question is whether you are justified in going away"—she paused, her eyes fixed steadily upon his—"whether you are free to go away and make a new life, whether it is ever justifiable to follow a phantom light when—when there's a lantern waiting to be carried." Her breath caught. She drew away from him, frightened and elated by her own words.

Loder turned to her sharply. "Eve!" he exclaimed; then his tone changed. "You don't know what you're saying," he added quickly. "You don't understand what you're saying."

Eve leaned forward again. "Yes," she said slowly. "I do understand." Her voice was controlled, her manner conscious. She was no longer the girl conquered by strength greater than her own. She was the woman strenuously demanding her right to individual happiness.

"I understand it all," she repeated. "I understand every point. It was no chance that made you change your identity, that made you care for me, that brought about—his death. I don't believe it was chance. I believe it was something much bigger. You are not meant to go away."

As Loder watched her the remembrance of his first days as Chilcote rose again, the remembrance of love he had then dimly felt with the belief that below her self possession lay a strength—a depth—uncommon in woman. As he stood there the pallor, the distinctive belief flamed into conviction.

"Eve!" he said involuntarily.

With a quick gesture she raised her head. "No!" she exclaimed. "No; don't say anything. You are going to see things as I see them—you will do as you have no choice. No real man ever casts away the substance for the shadow." Her eyes shone—the color, the glow, the vitality, rushed back into her face.

"John," she said softly, "I love you, and I need you, but there is something with a greater claim—a greater need than mine. Don't you know what it is?"

He said nothing. He made no gesture.

"It is the party—the country. You may put love aside, but duty is different. You have pledged yourself. You are not meant to draw back."

Loder's lips parted.

"Don't," she said again. "Don't say anything. I know all that is in your mind. But when we sift things right through it isn't my love—or our happiness—that's really in the balance. It is your future." Her voice thrilled. "You are going to be a great man, and a great man is the property of his country. He has no right to individual action."

Again Loder made an effort to speak, but again she checked him.

"Wait!" she exclaimed. "Wait! You believe you have acted wrongly, and you are desperately afraid of acting wrongly again. But is it really truer, more loyal for us to work out a long probation in grooves that are already overtilled than to marry quietly abroad and fill the places that have need of us? That is the question I want you to answer. Is it really truer and nobler? Oh, I see the doubt that is in your mind! You think it finer to go away and make a new life than to live the life that is waiting you—because one is independent and the other means the use of another man's name and another man's money—that is the thought in your mind. But what is it that prompts that thought?" Again her voice caught, but her eyes did not falter.—"I will tell you. It is not self sacrifice, but proud pride." She said the word fearlessly.

A flesh crossed Loder's face. "A man requires pride," he said in a low voice.

"Yes, at the right time. But is this the right time? Is it ever right to throw away the substance for the shadow? You say that I don't understand—don't realise. I realize more tonight than I have realized in all my life. I know that you have an opportunity that can never come again and that it's terribly possible to let it slip"—

"My consent or refusal lies with—my wife."

She paused. Loder, his hands resting on the closed doors of the cab, sat very silent, with averted eyes and bent head.

"Only tonight," she went on, "you told me that everything was crying to you to take the easy, pleasant way. Then it was strong to turn aside, but now it is not strong. It is far nobler to fill an empty niche than to carve out for yourself. John"—she suddenly leaned forward, laying her hands over his—"Mr. Praide told me tonight that in his new ministry my—my husband was to be undersecretary for foreign affairs."

The words fell softly, so softly that to ears less comprehending than Loder's their significance might have been lost, as his rigid attitude and unresponsive manner might have conveyed lack of understanding to any eyes less observant than Eve's.

For a long space there was no word spoken. At last, with a very gentle pressure, her fingers tightened over his hands.

"John," she began gently, but the word died away. She drew back into her seat as the cab stopped before Chilcote's house.

Simultaneously as they descended the hall door was opened and a flood of warm light poured oft reassuringly into the darkness.

"I thought it was your cab, sir," Crupham exclaimed deferentially as they passed into the hall. "Mr. Praide has been waiting to see you this half hour. I showed him into the study." He closed the door softly and retired.

Then in the warm light, amid the gravely dignified surroundings that had marked his first entry into this hazardous second existence, Eve turned to Loder for the verdict upon which her future hung.

As she turned his face was still hidden from her, and his attitude betrayed nothing.

"John," she said slowly, "you know why he is here. You know that he has come to personally offer you this place, to personally receive your refusal—or consent."

She ceased to speak, there was a moment of suspense, then Loder turned. His face was still pale as a grave with the gravity of a man who has but recently been close to death, but beneath the gravity was another look, the old expression of strength and self reliance, tempered, raised and dignified by a new humility.

Moving forward, he held out his hands.

"My consent or refusal," he said very quietly, "lies with—my wife."

BLOOD POISON THROUGH STOCKING DYE.
CURIOUS CASE AT KINGSTON.

While attending to her household duties Mrs. A. Harrison, Place-de-Armes, Kingston, (Ont.), struck her ankle against a projection which inflicted a cut. She paid little attention to the wound at the time, but in a few days it became swollen and very painful. A medical man was consulted, and it was then found that the dye from her stocking had got into the wound and set up blood poison. Then began a trying period of pain, which, had it not been for Zam-Buk, might not even yet have been ended. Mrs. Harrison says:—"The doctor ordered certain treatment, which I followed out; but the wound got no better, and refused to heal. It was most painful, and sometimes I could hardly bear to walk. I was almost in despair when a friend advised me to try Zam-Buk. It soon reduced the swelling and inflammation, and the pain—so acute before—got less and less until the ankle was quite easy. Then the wound began to heal, and a little more perseverance resulted in a complete cure."

Zam-Buk draws the pain and the poison from a wound at the same time. It heals ulcers, abscesses, sore feet, bad legs, and varicose ulcers. It cures insect stings, eczema, summer rashes, and heat spots; while as a cure for chronic wounds, scalds, burns, piles, ringworm, scalp sores, and sores due to blood poisons, it is entirely without equal. All stores and druggists sell at fifty cents, or post-free from the Zam-Buk Co., Toronto, for price.

A Sound Stomach Means a Clear Head.—The high pressure of a nervous life which business men of the present day are constrained to live make draughts upon their vitality highly detrimental to their health. It is only by the most careful treatment that they are able to keep themselves alert and active in their various callings, many of them know the value of Parmelee's Vegetable Pills in combating the ennui and consequently keeping the head clear.

Mild in Their Action.— Parmelee's Vegetable Pills are very mild in their action. They do not cause griping in the stomach or cause disturbance there as so many pills do. Pills not so carefully prepared.

PRESENTATION AND ADDRESS.

On Friday evening last, about 8.15 o'clock, a number of friends of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Glenn, who were leaving Napanee the next morning to reside in Toronto, gathered at the Campbell House, on the eve of their departure, and presented each with a beautiful plain gold band ring surmounted with monogram, Mr. Glenn being "W.G." and Mrs. Glenn's "N.G." Mr. H. Taylor, proprietor of the Campbell House, read the following address:

Napanee, June 21st, 1907.

Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Glenn—

At the earnest solicitation of your friends a most pleasing duty is imposed upon me. The knowledge that you are severing the ties of friendship fashioned by many years of intercourse, is received with much regret.

You and your estimable life's companion have won for yourselves a prominent place as shrewd traders of the highest and esteem in which you are all held you. To be resident should serve one community for years, the possessor of a century, speaks volumes for your honesty, industry and sterling qualities of character.

As you leave Napanee, Mr. Glenn, I am only voicing in terms of the fondest appreciation, the sentiments and sterlings are enjoyed in every respect, the more because of the growing unreliability of employers. The same tribute of praise is due Mrs. Glenn, whose faithful and efficient service rendered her on more than one occasion. We trust these gifts will be regarded as a substantial token of friendships existing—lasting, binding and unbroken.

In going to your new home accept the best wishes that you may be successful and happy in all. As this day is the longest of the year, so may it be figurative of the wealth of health and success that comes to you in the journey of life.

Should the charms of old Napanee associations be too strong to resist—in other words, should prompt the re-assembling of open arms of "welcome back."

H. TAYLOR.

On behalf of many friends.

News From Our Ready-to-wear Department

A Department of Which We are Justly Proud.

Each season the business of this section has increased. Every season we have added new lines to this extensive department. We have devoted much time and study to make our Ready-to-wear Section what it is to-day, and we can now truly say that it stands in the front rank.

Whatever you may require in neat fitting, well tailored garments, you can get here.

If it's a handsome silk costume, we have it. If a beautiful long silk coat, it's here. Should you require a separate skirt, we can fit you. Our range of ready-to-wear waists was never as complete. Our showing of whitewear alone is worth a visit to this Department.

Every week through the columns of the newspapers we tell of doings in this great store. Every item quoted is genuine. One visit will convince you.

Our Usual Invitation to our Dress Goods Section

We have this week just time and space to introduce a few numbers from this section.

SILK BATISTE will be one of our special showings. This is a light, exceptionally cool silk material. We are showing it in white with black spots and stripes; also white with blue. When selecting that hot weather dress ask to see it at 75c and $1.00.

METALLIC SPOT WAISTINGS—This is a line of navy mohair with metallic spots. It's 42 in. wide and makes a very durable waist at 50c yd.

HOMESPUNS—For a coat and skirt we are selling a line of cream homespuns in a 42 in. material. It comes in open checks of navy, black and green. Just the proper weight and makes a very durable skirt or costume 50c per yard.

The Robinson Co. system is to have all its employees know all they can about the goods they handle, and about other goods as opportunity offers, that they may give you the most intelligent service. We don't want a bit of mystery about the business—you are to come just as you go to your pantry or closet, knowing that on whatever shelf you reach you will find proper things for your uses.

Men and Boys' Clothes for Real Summer.

Business keeps getting larger as men convince themselves that Robinson's serve best, We're just as good natured too when adjusting a complaint as when you are buying.

Coat and Trouser Suits for Hot Weather.

The coats are shoulder lined- the whole suit as light as you can wish. Being of strictly wool fabrics and being really tailored, the $10 and $12 suits will hold their shape. Other prices, $5.00 and $7.50. Light Grey Oxfords in checks and stripes. Dark mixed Homespuns in checks. Blue Serge Coat and Trouser Suits.

250 Boys' Washable Suits are Here.

Two weeks ago this stock of boys' tub suits looked like a "frost", now we're glad they're here. It is wise to be armed at all points. So many think "well it's a washable suit and that's all you can say about it." Not at all. We take at much pains about the requirements of tub suits as we do with woolen suits

Boys' Summer Shirts

We have dozens of different lines for you to choose from. As a mother said one day last week "why you have almost every material made up here", and so we have. Light colors, dark colors, with collar attached and without collar, for church or for picnic, for the boy of 5 as well as the boy of 15. And the prices are 39c, 50c, 75c.

Men's Sox.

When others are out of lines we still have them. In the summer we sell as many heavy woolen sox as many stores sell in the winter, because many can only wear the heavy wool at any time. But good gracious, the cotton sox we sell is wonderful.

Plain Blacks and Fancy Hose at 10c to 50c.
Every day Cotton Sox at 3 for 25c and up.

Ellis Spring Needle Underwear for Men

The Ellis Garment is different from all others, because the Spring Needle Ribbed Machines on which the Ellis Fabric is made are the only ones used in Canada. The Spring Needle Ribbed Fabric stretches, but never stays stretched, therefore, there is no looseness at one point and increased tightness at another. Nor is there any possibility of its bagging at the knees, the elbows and seat, nor pulling at the ankles. The Ellis Spring Needle Ribbed Underwear always retains its original fit. It is positively guaranteed not to stretch or shrink nor get out of shape.

BALBRIGGAN—Natural color, 50c and 75c a garment.
COMBINATION SUITS in Balbriggan, $1.50 a suit.
COMBINATION SUITS in pure natural light-weight wool, $2 50 suit.

OBITUARY.

STEPHEN AMEY.

Mr. Stephen Amey, one of the old residents of the Township of Camden, passed away somewhat suddenly after a year's illness. The funeral took place from St. Luke's church on June 8th, being conducted by the rector, Rev. C. E. S. Radclife, assisted by a good choir. There was a large congregation present to show respect to his memory. The pall bearers were near friends of the deceased. He leaves a widow and daughter and grand children to mourn his loss. They have the sympathy of the neighborhood. Deceased was highly respected in the community.

GEORGE SCHRYVER.

Truly a pioneer of Napanee, passed peacefully away last Saturday night, at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Robt. J. Dickinson, Adelaide st., in his eighty-fifth year. Deceased had enjoyed exceptionally good health during his long life, until a few months ago, when he began to fail. Surrounded by loving friends and the gentle ministrations of a loving daughter, his end was peaceful and happy. Mr. Schryver was a quiet upright citizen and for half a century a faithful employee of the G. T. Railway, and ran its first locomotive in this section, while the road was under construction. He was the eldest member of Union Lodge No. 9, A. F. & A. M., and his remains were followed to their last resting place on Tuesday afternoon, by a large number of his Masonic brethren, who performed their impressive ceremony at the grave. Deceased leaves four children to mourn the loss of a kind and indulgent father, viz.: Mr. Geo. L. Schryver, merchant, Cleveland, Ohio; Mrs. (Capt.) Collins, and Mrs. T. Tobey, Picton, and Mrs. R. J. Dickinson, Napanee.

POLICE COURT.

On Monday Chief Graham had five well known young men before Police Magistrate Ruskin, the charge being fast driving on the streets of Napanee, for which a fine was imposed and paid. Yesterday five other young men, who reside in the country were up on the same charge. This is a matter that will have to be looked into, as it will soon be thoroughly understood that fast driving on our streets is a prosecutable offence.

Another matter that the Chief is looking after is the practice of riding bicycles on the sidewalks, and he says he will be cruel with the habit of compelling the wait with bicycles to appear before the police court. Police Court by entering the law.

Also a number of people are in the habit of driving fast over the bridges leading into the town. These points are being closely watched, and as motive has been frequently given for the first offence, it will be strictly enforced in the future.

All "fall-downs" on the sidewalks, as well as the law, are to be reported to the Chief in performing his somewhat important duty.

SACREDNESS OF HOME
EVIL OF OFFICIAL CORRUPTION AND WICKEDNESS IN HIGH PLACES.
ST. PAUL'S STRAIGHT TALK
Call to Better and True Life—Preserve Marriage as The Inviolate—Maintain Purity of Domestic Fireside — Denunciation of Graft in Political Life—Moral Cowards—Danger of Prosperity.
Entered according to Act of Parliament of Canada, in the year 1907, by Frederick Diver, Toronto, at the Dept. of Agriculture, Ottawa.
Los Angeles, Cal., June 16.—In this sermon the preacher shows the evil of official corruption and wickedness in high places; a lesson which has a peculiar application to governors and judges in our own day. The text is Acts xxiv, 25, "Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season I will call for thee."
"What is a change of venue?" I asked a newspaper friend. "A venue," he answered, "is merely the legal name for the place of a trial. Now, the place of venue is sometimes changed for the convenience of witnesses. Sometimes it is due to the fact of a county judge being an interested party in a criminal suit. Sometimes, as in a murder case where the whole region is inflamed with passion, the trial is changed to another county far away from where the deed has been committed so that the defendant may be able to get a jury of twelve unbiased men to pass a just verdict upon his motives and his deed. Never since the world was started has it been fair to try a man before a prejudiced or a partial court."
Now, Claudius Lysias, commander of the Roman troops, who had charge of the temple at Jerusalem, was an honest official. He knew that Paul was being mobbed by the populace and could never get a fair and impartial trial in the Hebrew capital. He also knew that the longer Paul stayed there the bitterer would become the prejudices of the people. So he said thus: "I know what I will do. I will send the prisoner north to Caesarea Palestina, about fifty-five miles away. Then by the change of venue Paul will be in a new city under an impartial judge." And Claudius Lysias sends Paul to Felix, the governor at Caesarea Palestina with a letter stating the case. That was the reason why the venue of Paul's trial was changed from Jerusalem to Caesarea Palestina.
But Paul did not get a speedy trial at Caesarea. He was summoned before the governor again and again. There he faced his witnesses. There he pleaded for his life, and there he preached righteousness, temperance and judgment to come; with such power that Governor Felix trembled. The judge in this case became the defendant and the defendant became the judge. Felix trembled and answered: "Go thy way for this time. When I have a more convenient season I will call for thee." As Felix received the pleadings of Paul, some of us are receiving our convenient call to the better and the truer life.
Governor Felix was like many sinners in our day. He wanted to conceal for a little while longer his domestic sins. He wanted to go on practicing his libertinisms unmolested. He wanted to do just as David did when he took unto himself Uriah's wife to be his wife. He wanted to do as Herod did when he took unto himself Herodias, his brother Philip's wife, to be his wife. He wanted to do as Antipas did when he brutally divorced his own wife, Scribonia, to marry Livia, who was the wife of Tiberius Claudius Nero. He did as Mark Antony, who deliberately severed his bond unto his beautiful wife, the noble and chaste Octavia, in order to enter a sinful alliance with the far famed voluptuary Cleopatra, the Egyptian queen. He did as thousands of men and women of this generation are doing today in the divorce courts, all for secret or open immortalities, are defiling the sacred law of the marital relations, making the old fashioned name of husband and wife a mere secular arrangement and bringing such a discredit upon the wedding ring that it is of no more strength than a spider's web, which can be snapped in a day.
Come, Paul; tell us who was this Drusilla sitting beside Governor Felix, listening to your invectives? Was she a princess? Yes; the records show she was the daughter of a king. Was she beautiful? Oh, yes. Legend tells us she was one of the most beautiful women of all the east. Was she a queen? Yes; she was now the wife of the ruler of a province. She was the consort of Caesarea Palestina. But she had been more than that. She had been the wife of the King of Emesa. She deliberately left her first husband because Felix fell in love with her and could offer her a more beautiful palace in which to live. Thus as John the Baptist pointed his condemnatory finger at Herod and said, "It is not lawful for thee to have her; thou hast no right to Herodias," Paul was pointing the condemnatory finger at Governor Felix when he reasoned of righteousness which forbade such actions. And to-day Paul is pointing the condemnatory finger at every man and woman who is cherishing at heart an illicit love. He is saying, "In the name of God, thou must not, Thou shalt not, covet thy neighbor's wife nor his daughter nor his sister; thou shalt not covet any one who has not day? Are we not as a nation rapidly drifting toward such a condition as existed in ancient Rome when it was not considered a disgrace for a woman or a man to be divorced four or five times and where virtue was esteemed as as one of the nonessentials of the purity of the domestic fireside? Ought the epitaph which was cut into the tomb of Titus Claudius Secundus to be your epitaph? Here in all that remains of him. The loves and wines and amours destroy our bodies, but they make up life. Farewell!" Oh, my friend, like Felix of old, art thou a living devotee of wine and licentious affections? What is thy life before God and man in a true domestic sense. Hast thou, O immoral leper, a Drusilla sitting by thy side? If thou hast, then Paul is preaching unto thee righteousness and temperance and judgment to come. Thou canst not stop thine ears to his arraignment any more than David could when Nathan or Herod ignore John the Baptist or Felix could ignore with Paul. thy domestic life a true, pure, clean life? That is what God is desiring for thee. Better crush that hideous skeleton of sin which thou hast hidden away in thy closet. Crush it in God's name, and crush it now.

But Felix had more than the sin of illicit passion at his door. He was, like Pilate, officially corrupt. He was open to sell his soul, his honor, his oath of office. He was ready to sell everybody about him and anything that he had for money or position. He knew, after he had heard the arguments, that there was no case against Paul. Every sense of justice demanded that he should say to the prisoner, "Paul, thou art free." But he kept Paul for two long years in prison for the temple at Jerusalem, was an honest official. He knew that Paul was being mobbed by the populace and could never get a fair and impartial trial in the Hebrew capital. He also knew that the longer Paul stayed there the bitterer would become the prejudices of the people. So he said thus: "I know what I will do. I will send the prisoner north to Caesarea Palestina, about fifty-five miles away. Then by the change of venue Paul will be in a new city under an impartial judge." And Claudius Lysias sends Paul to Felix, the governor at Caesarea Palestina with a letter stating the case. That was the reason why the venue of Paul's trial was changed from Jerusalem to Caesarea Palestina.
But Paul did not get a speedy trial at Caesarea. He was summoned before the governor again and again. There he faced his witnesses. There he pleaded for his life, and there he preached righteousness, temperance and judgment to come; with such power that Governor Felix trembled. The judge in this case became the defendant and the defendant became the judge. Felix trembled and answered: "Go thy way for this time. When I have a more convenient season I will call for thee." And to-day Paul is pointing the condemnatory finger at every man and woman who is cherishing at heart an illicit love. He is saying, "In the name of God, thou must not, Thou shalt not, covet thy neighbor's wife nor his daughter nor his sister; thou shalt not covet any one who has not to glisten in their eyes. I see them bury their faces in their hands and shake with grief. Then instead of a bitter invective I hear Paul's voice as soft and rippling as the mountain brook. At times he seems to be whispering as low as the sighing winds. I come nearer to hear. Then I ask: "What is it, Paul? Why are this guilty man and this guilty woman weeping? Have you been able to find any sympathetic chord of affection throbbing in their breasts?" "Oh, yes," answers Paul. "Even Felix and Drusilla have listened to the higher calls of love in their past lives. Even the most vile of men and the most corrupt of women have the germ seeds of gospel love in their lives if you can only find them." Is not Paul's statement true? Can we not find the germ seeds of a pure love even among the most corrupt of social outcasts?
Because men and women scorn our pleas and turn deaf ears to our messages is no reason why they cannot be brought to Christ if we only appeal to them in the right way. Dr. Justin Fenner has in this same years ago some workmen were making an excavation in Victoria Park, London. Suddenly the walls caved in and the workmen were imprisoned in the ditch and threatened with suffocation. Among the crowds of curiosity seekers which gathered around there was one man who stood looking on as listlessly as most of the men who were standing about. Suddenly a poor man called him by name and cried: "Man, why don't you get to work? Do you not know your brother is down there in that ditch?" With that the man threw off his coat and went heroically to work to save his brother. Finally the imprisoned men were all saved, and every man and woman can be drawn to work for Christ if we only know upon what chord of love to play, as that man was roused from lethargic curiosity into an intense energy by the call of a brother's name.
I wonder what appeal of love Paul made when he was pleading for Jesus Christ before Felix and Drusilla. I wonder if this beautiful woman ever had a golden-haired little girl or boy by her first husband? I wonder if she had ever pillowed her darling's head upon her breast and gently lulled her to sleep in the evening hour. I wonder if, after she had been wooed into the land of sin by Felix, she had turned her back upon her babies and left them behind when she left her first husband? I wonder if in the midnight hour sometimes she heard those babies calling to her when she awoke with a start? Then I wonder if off in the distance she saw their white baby hands beckoning and she heard the little voices crying: "Mother, mother! Are you not coming back to us, mother? I am your baby. Will you not come back to me?" Yes, I have sometimes wondered if when Paul preached Christ to Drusilla he did not turn and say, "Master, will you not give thy heart to Jesus for the babies' sake?"
But I cannot close this sermon without asking myself just one more question. Was Felix Paul's martyrdom in Rome had anything to do with the refusal of Felix to let Paul go free? I wonder if when Paul was carried to Rome, Caesar never examined into his case at all? But when the Caesar was asked, "Shall Paul be beheaded?" he merely said: "Well, if Governor Felix would not let him go free, he must be guilty. Let him die." And I sometimes wonder, if we refuse Christ to-day, if there will not be some Caesar living thousands of miles away from us who will be led to reject our Christ merely because we are rejecting him now.
It is an awful thing to think about what is going to happen after we are dead. There is a beautiful story told by Captain Macmanara of the Yacht Massachusetts infantry that after the battle of Santiago, in the trenches, the soldiers, with empty haversacks, had to lie down to sleep with nothing to eat. While the great army was resting for the next day's carnage one of the boys of his company, more hungry than the rest and unable to sleep, rose and went out to seek food among the dead. He knelt by the side of one of his dead comrades, opened his haversack and found there four rolls. One by one he put them into his own haversack and arose to seek his own place among the living. After he had gone a few paces he suddenly stopped. Then he retraced his steps. He put those rolls back into the dead man's haversack. He gently drew the cloak over the dead man's face and by his actions seemed to say, "I will not, I cannot, rob the dead." But, though triumph over wrong, how could his actions seemed to say, "I will not, I cannot, rob the dead." But, though triumph over wrong, how could his actions seemed to say, "I will not, I cannot, rob the dead." But, though triumph over wrong, how could his actions seemed to say, "I will not, I cannot, rob the dead." But, though triumph over wrong, how could his you and I would not want to rob the dead, did you ever stop to think that when we are dead in the flesh our spiritual influences will still be living on? Then we shall be influencing the living either for Christ or away from Christ, even as Felix, the governor of Judaea, influenced the sections of a Caesar in reference to a Paul far away from Caesarea Palestina after his official throne had been handed over to his successor, Governor Festus.

I think it was what Paul said of the judgment to come that stirred Felix and made him tremble. Paul was familiar with the Jewish Scriptures and knew what that judgment meant. He knew the danger he was incurring. He knew that he must stand before God and answer for the deeds done in the body. No wonder he trembled. But he took refuge, as so many do to-day, in procrastination. He meant to repent at some future time when he had "a convenient season." My brother, do not put off that time as Felix did. It may never come. Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation.

All Kinds of Hammers.
The hammer, besides being a tool of universal use, is probably the oldest representative of a mechanic's tool kit. The hammer was originally a stone fastened to a handle with thongs, and it was as useful as a weapon as a tool. Hammers are of all sizes, from the dainty instruments used by the jeweler, which weigh less than half an ounce, to the gigantic fifty-ton hammers of shipbuilding establishments, which have a habit of falling force of from ninety to a hundred tons.—Baltimore Sun.

Cruel Backaches.

THE TROUBLE USUALLY DUE TO POOR BLOOD—DR. WILLIAMS' PINK PILLS THE CURE.

There is a common notion that backache is a sign of kidney disease, but this is absolutely wrong. Not one backache in a hundred has anything to do with the kidneys. Hundreds of people die of kidney disease who never had a backache—and hundreds who suffer continually from backache have nothing wrong with their kidneys. By far the most common cause of backache is muscular rheumatism. Nearly all the cases of backache are due to the weakness and poor, watery blood, or in case of young girls and women, to the secret ailments that make the lives of so many of that sex miserable. Don't let a backache settle down on you. Don't let your back have trouble. What is really coming back in the average backache is tonic, blood-building medicine, and Dr. William Pink Pills are the greatest blood making medicine medical science has yet discovered. Every dose actually makes new, rich blood, and this new blood carries nourishment to the nerves, headache, backache, heart palpitations, indigestion, neuralgia, rheumatism, and the ailments of girlhood and womanhood. Mrs. W. Cox, Streetsville, Ont., says: "I was a great sufferer from anaemia. I was completely run down and was tortured with headaches and backaches and dizzy spells. I doctor ed for a long time but was no better than when I began. Then I began to take Dr. Williams' Pink Pills and after using them a few months I was entirely restored to health." Get the genuine pills with the full name, "Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People" on the wrapper around each box. All medicine dealers or by mail at 50 cents a box or six boxes for $2.50 from the Dr. Williams' Medicine Co., Brockville, Ont.

DON'T DIE AT 45.
CURE THE INDIGESTION WHICH IS SO LIABLE TO LEAD TO APOPLEXY.
People who suffer with headache, giddiness, palpitation, bad taste in the mouth, drowsiness, distress after eating, and any of the other distressing results of indigestion, are in serious danger. Their digestive organs cannot care for the food properly and hence the coats of the blood vessels in the brain get little nourishment, become brittle, and finally yield to the fierce blood pressure and one is then said to have a stroke, or be paralyzed, or die from apoplexy.
In all diseases of digestion and nutrition the prescription called Mi-o-na has proven itself of great value. It is relied upon to-day as a certainty to relieve the worst troubles of indigestion and make a complete cure.
That Mi-o-na will cure the worst forms of stomach trouble, cancer excepted, and give quick relief in indigestion, is backed by the guarantee T. B. Wallace gives with every 50-cent box to refund the money unless Mi-o-na cures. A guarantee like this must inspire confidence.

WHAT IS JUNK?

Answer:

Cash, if properly handled. Few people realize that the waste or worn out material, such as old rubbers, brass, copper, lead, zinc, rags, bones, and all kinds of scrap iron is worth at least an average of $12.00 per year, per family, if properly taken care of and delivered at my Junk Yard, west side of Market Square, Napanee.

Take for example, old worn out rubbers. At present I am paying 8 cents a lb. for old rubber boots and shoes, including old rubber gum boots. Why, then, sell them for two to three cents a lb. to some wandering Jew or some other tramp peddler, when by selling them to me, you can get eight cents a lb.? Remember I am paying the highest cash prices fog all kinds of old junk, delivered at my yard.

Parties in town, leaving word at my office or sending me a postal card or even a letter, I will send after your junk and pay spot cash for same at my office. Out of town parties, ship your junk by rail or boat to me and receive prompt cash returns for same.

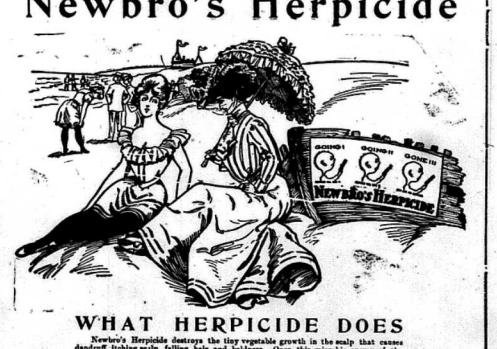
Newbro's Herpicide



WHAT HERPICIDE DOES

Newbro's Herpicide destroys the tiny vegetable growth in the scalp that causes dandruff, itching scalp, falling hair and baldness. Once this microbic enemy of the hair is destroyed and kept out of the scalp, the hair is bound to grow as nature intended, except in a few of chronic baldness.

WHAT SUNLIGHT DOES

Sunlight is nature's germ destroyer and prophylactic. The effect of sunlight upon the scalp is most highly beneficial. Newbro's Herpicide is carried out This cannot be done without the use of Herpicide, which prevents inf.ction and keeps the scalp pure and wholesome.

More men and women have gotten positive results from the use of Newbro's Herpicide than from all other hair remedies combined,

HOT WEATHER TROUBLES

The perspiration that exudes in increased quantities during the summer months, carries out poisonous and refuse matter that would otherwise clog up the pores of the scalp.

Incomplete elimination of this waste, produces a hot and feverish condition of the sweat glands known as Prickly Heat for which Herpicide gives immediate relief. Herpicide stops itching of the scalp instantly.

Col. Thomp ns t n, Member of the Board of Managers of the Ohio Penitentiary, writes as follows of Newbro's Herpicide:

"As to Herpicide I find it an excellent hair dressing as well as being the first and only ab s'e ke dandruff cure I have found Upon my advice a number of my friends are using Herpicide and of the unanimous effect is, that Herpicide is, in all respects, everything that its manufacturers claim for it."

Guaranteed under the Food and Drugs Act, June 30, 1906. Serial No. 915.

Two sizes—50c and $1.00—Sold at Drug Stores.

STOVER—HARTMAN.

A pleasing event took place at the home of Mr. Miles S. Stover, West Napanee, on Wednesday evening, at 8 o'clock, when his eldest daughter, Miss Lily Gertrude, was united in marriage to Mr. E. P. Hartman, of Kingston. Rev. G. S. White performed the ceremony in the presence of only a few friends of the contracting parties. The fair bride was given away by her father, and was dressed in blue cloth skirt, with a white silk waist covered with cream all-over lace. After the ceremony the guests sat down to an elaborate supper. The bride was the recipient of a number of beautiful and costly presents, some coming from friends in Guelph, Toronto, Hamilton, Deseronto and King t on. The groom's present to the bride was a handsome gold watch and pin. The newly married couple left on Thursday evening for their home in Kingston, carrying with them the best wishes of a large circle of friends.

A rather unusual coincidence is, that the minister, Rev. G. S. White, united in marriage Mr. Stover, the bride's father, and preached her mother's funeral sermon.

O'SULLIVAN—MURPHY.

A pretty wedding took place at St. Patrick's church, Napanee, on Monday morning, June 24th, at 8.30, when Miss Josephine Murphy, daughter of Mr. Thos. Murphy, was united in wedlock to Mr. Wm. O'Sullivan, of Bleasington. Rev. Father O'Connor celebrated the nuptial mass and performed the ceremony. The bride was handsomely attired in a gown of white India silk with wreath and veil and wore an amethyst cross and chain, the gift of the groom. The bride was attended by her sister, Miss Mary Murphy, who was becomingly attired in a gown of white organdie with hat to match. Her gift from the groom was a pretty amethyst ring. The groom was assisted by his brother, Joseph O'Sullivan. After the ceremony the wedding party repaired to the home of the bride's father, Centre st., where a dainty wedding breakfast awaited them. The bride's travelling dress was a handsome suit of grey ladies' cloth. Mr. and Mrs. O'Sullivan left on the noon train for Detroit, and on their return will reside in Bleasington. Their many friends join in wishing them a happy and prosperous journey through life.

LANG—STEPHENS.

The wedding of Miss Frances Mary Stephens, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Stephens, and Mr. Walter Johnstone Lang took place at Allaire, N.Y., yesterday morning at 10 o'clock at the home of the bride's parents, 518 Madison avenue. Only relatives and intimate friends were present. The parlors where the ceremony was performed by Rev. Dr. Edgar H. Ivens were decorated with American beauty roses and palms. The bride wore a gown of white embroidered batiste and carried bride's roses. Her attendant, who was her sister, Miss Agnes Stephens, wore a white lingerie gown and carried pink roses. At the wedding breakfast which followed covers were laid for 10 and the table decorations were pink sweet peas. Those at table were Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Stephens, Mr. and Mrs. Lane, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Grosse and Miss Gertrude Grosse, of England, Miss Agnes Stephens and the Rev. Dr. Brown. Mr. and Mrs. Lane left on the morning train for Canada where the honeymoon will be spent. Mrs. Lane wore a travelling costume of grey. Upon their return they will live at 516 Madison avenue, in a house recently built under the supervision of the bride's father. The bride was the leading soprano and the bridegroom the solo tenor at the First Methodist church.

SHORTS—JARRELL.

At Newburgh, on Wednesday, June 26th, a quiet but very pretty wedding took place at the residence of Mr. Chas. D. Shorts, when his fifth daughter, Miss Edna, was united in marriage to Mr. John A. Jarrell, of Rochester, N.Y., only son of Mr. F. B. Jarrell, of Trenton, Ont. Promptly at 12 o'clock, to the strains of the wedding march, played by Mrs. Elgin Parrott, of Odessa, the bridal party took their position under a beautiful spreading arch of ferns and evergreens, trimmed with roses, lilies, etc., a large floral bell forming a pendent in the centre under which the sacred vows were administered by the Rev. J. F. Mears. The bride was becomingly attired in white point de sprit over white silk and carried a shower bouquet of cream roses. She was given away by her father. After the ceremony a wedding luncheon was partaken of, served by her lady friends, Mrs. Geo. Walker, Newburgh, Mrs. Parrott, Odessa, Miss Ethel Clancy, Centreville, and Mrs. Bert Bellis, of Richmond. The bride received a host of a lot of beautiful presents. The newly wedded couple took the 3.15 train amidst a shower of rice and best wishes of a host of friends. They will spend a week with friends in Trenton and return to Newburgh before finally returning to their home in Rochester. The bride's travelling dress was navy blue chiffon cloth, with silk blouse and hat to match.

PRICE—SPROULE.

A very happy event took place on Wednesday evening, June 26th, at 6 o'clock, at the home of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Jas. Sproule, of Hayside, formerly of Westbrooke, when their daughter, Lillian Rosamond, was united in marriage to Mr. W. Francis Price, of Brockville, by Rev. H. W. Foley. At the hour appointed the bride looking very sweet and girlish in her handsome gown of cream voile and lace, carrying a beautiful bouquet of white carnations, entered the cozy parlor leaning on the arm of her father. At the conclusion of the impressive ceremony a dainty luncheon was served. The decorations of the bride's table were lilies of the and ferns. After a couple of hours spent in social intercourse the happy couple left amid a shower of rice and the good wishes of all for an extended trip to Toronto and North Bay. Her going away gown was grey with hat to match. The bride was the recipient of a number of very pretty and useful presents showing the high esteem in which she is held. Among the guests present were Mr. and Mrs. T. Sproule, Westbrooke, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Sproule, Odessa, and Mrs. Harlan Lee, Napanee. On their return Mr. and Mrs. Price will take up their residence in Brockville. At the conclusion of the marriage ceremony, a niece of the bride, little Helen Hermiter, only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Sproule, Odessa, was baptized.

CRONE—JACKSON, CLANCY—JACKSON

Cupid has been busy in the home of Mr. Ard Jackson, Enterprise, and has succeeded in inducing away two of the fair daughters from the parental roof. On June 19th, at the Methodist parsonage, the fourth daughter, Miss Josephine Jackson, was united in marriage to Mr. Byron Crone, of Hinchinbrook. The wedding was a quiet but very pretty affair, the only guests being attended by Miss Edith Crone, while the groom was ably supported by his cousin, Mr. Arthur Crone. The happy couple took train for the west amid a shower of rice and the hearty congratulations of their friends. Upon their return they will reside in Hinchinbrook.

One week later at the same place and by the same clergyman, Miss Ida May Jackson, the youngest daughter, was joined in holy matrimony to Mr. Geo. R. Clancy, of Centreville. The ceremony, though private, was fittingly performed with all due dignity and solemnity. The bride was accompanied by a sister of the groom, Miss Ethel M. Clancy, and Mr. G. W. Hanna efficiently acted as best man. The groom is one of the most popular young men of the community, and is receiving many congratulations on his good fortune.

A large circle of friends with the two contracting parties a beautiful share of happiness and a most prosperous future. Although this is the first Mrs. Crone from this community where she was most highly respected and deservedly popular, we are pleased that we shall still have the cheery presence of Mrs. Clancy with us.
